Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: “An act to increase the pensions of invalids in certain cases; for the relief of invalids of the militia; and for the appointment of pension agents in those States where there is no commissioner of loans,” and “An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1816,” were read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed “An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States,” with amendments. The Senate have also passed a bill “supplementary to an act, entitled, ‘An act to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia;’” in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

THE TARIFF.

The House then took up the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill to regulate the duties on imports—Mr. WRIGHT’s motion, to exclude from voting all members concerned in manufacturing, being still under consideration.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, expressed his regret that his colleague had offered the resolution, and made one or two remarks on its impropriety; after which,

The resolution was withdrawn by the mover, and the question then recurred on Mr. FORSYTH’s motion, so to amend the amendment of the committee respecting the duty on imported cottons, as to substitute a duty thereon of twenty per cent. ad valorem from the 30th of June next.

Mr. WRIGHT proposed to modify this amendment, by making the duty twenty-one per cent., which he thought was an ample protection, and with which the manufacturers ought to be satisfied.

Mr. SMITH objected to this modification, because it varied in so small a degree from the original motion. He had hoped that some gentleman would propose to return to the twenty-five per cent. reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, which he would prefer as a permanent protection.

Mr. HARDIN moved still further to amend the original motion by making the duty twenty-five per cent. for two years after June, and twenty per cent. thereafter; which Mr. WRIGHT accepted as a modification of his motion.

Mr. MASON then spoke at considerable length on the general question of protection, giving a summary history of the rise of cotton manufactures in this country, and adducing various statements and calculations to prove the necessity of a high duty in order to sustain the existing manufactures.

Mr. HOPKINSON remarked, that the arguments submitted by Mr. MASON were so conclusive on his mind of the necessity of a liberal protection, that they had decided him to vote for Mr. HARDIN's amendment.

Mr. PICKERING argued a short time against an extravagant duty, as unnecessary for a reasonable protection, not believing that the existing manufactures required a duty of twenty-five per cent. for two years; after which, the question on Mr. HARDIN's motion was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 60, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Atherton, Baer, Barbour, Bassett, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Burnside, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clarke of North Carolina, Clayton, Culpeper, Cutbert, Edwards, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Grosvenor, Hale, Hall, Hanson, Hardin, Hawes, Heister, Henderson, Herbert, Hopkinson, Huger, Hungerford, Jewett, Johnson of Va., Kent, Kerr of Virginia, King of North Carolina, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Love, Lovett, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyon, McCoy, McKee, Middleton, Moore, Moseley, Nelson of Mississippi, Nelson of Virginia, Noyes, Pickens, Pickering, Pinkney, Pleasants, Randolph, Reed, Roane, Root, Ross, Ruggles, Sheffy, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Virginia, Stearns, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tate, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Thomas, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Whiteside, Wilcox, Wilde, Woodward, Wright, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Adgate, Alexander, Baker, Bateman, Baylies, Bennett, Betts, Birdsall, Boss, Brooks, Calhoun, Chipman, Clendennin, Comstock, Conner, Crawford, Creighton, Crocheron, Darlington, Davenport, Desha, Glasgow, Gold, Griffin, Hahn, Hulbert, Ingham, Irwin of Pennsylvania, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Lyle, Maclay, Marsh, Mason, Mayrant, McLean, Milnor, Newton, Parris, Piper, Pitkin, Powell, Reynolds, Sergeant, Savage, Schenck, Sharpe, Southard, Strong, Taul, Throop, Townsend, Wallace, Ward of New York, Wendover, Wheaton, Wilkin, Willoughby, William Wilson, and Yates.

Mr. MASON then moved further to amend the amendment by striking out the minimum duty of twenty per cent. and the limitation to the twenty-five per cent., as reported originally by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HARDIN opposed this motion, and wished he could ascertain what gentlemen really wanted. They first voted for thirty per cent. for two years, then for twenty-five, for the same period; and he had no doubt they would next be very willing to accept twenty per cent. Their policy seemed to be to get all they could and keep what they got.

Mr. HULBERT replied to Mr. HARDIN, denying any impropriety in the course adopted by the friends of the manufacturers; showing that they had asked no further protection than the Secretary of the Treasury, after long inquiry, made by the order of Congress, and mature preparation, had recommended as a proper and necessary encouragement; that the House have decided against the thirty-three per cent. reported in the tariff of the Secretary, they wished only now to bring back the duty to what was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion made by Mr. MASON, and the question of concurring or disagreeing with the Committee of the Whole, being the same, Mr. MASON withdrew his amendment, and the question recurred on agreeing with the Committee of the whole House in their amendment, as amended by Mr. HARDIN's motion.

On this question there was much desultory debate; a few only of the gentlemen who participated entering into the general subject.

Mr. GROSVENOR spoke in favor of the graduated duty. He argued, that as it had been admitted on all hands that present protection only was necessary to the manufacturers, and as they had acknowledged that twenty-five per cent. was sufficient for that purpose, it was of course too high for a permanent duty, and he was opposed to it.

Mr. GASTON replied to some previous remarks of Mr. HULBERT, and stated a fact, that a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means were at first in favor of twenty per cent. only until the day of the report, when a compromise had taken place with the gentlemen who wish a higher duty, and twenty-five per cent. was reported in the bill.

Mr. TELFAIR spoke as follows: On the subject of impost I hold it a sound general rule that no other or higher duties should be laid than are both necessary and proper for the purposes of revenue. To attempt more, necessarily increases the inducements to smuggling; and if the encouragement of manufactures be the object, it is, in effect, to plunge on the wide ocean of uncertainty, guided by factitious lights, emanating from the selfishness alone of those who tender them, and which never can be relied upon for the purposes of wise legislation.

I will not deny but that, in the imposition of duties for the purposes of revenue, it is wise so to select your objects that while the original intent is secured, the interest of the manufacturer may be regarded as an incidental consideration. But what is the character of the measure before you? Instead of contemplating the protection and encouragement of manufactures as secondary or collateral, it refers to them as the primary and essential cause of legislation; instead of the benefits flowing to them being considered merely as some alleviation of burdens, made necessary by the wants of the Government, their encouragement has, in the whole course of the discussion, been placed in the foreground, and admitted to be the principal object for which so enormous a tax is laid upon the people of this country—a tax, the proceeds of which, so far as it means protection, are never to enter the coffers of the nation, but, by a species of magic, transferred from the hands of the consumer into those of the manufacturer—paid by the people indeed, but not for the purposes of Government.

The support of this bill rests upon two considerations. First, it is urged that the course of measures pursued by Government for some time previous to, as well as during the war, had the tendency of a pledge of support. This suggestion involves a principle of more importance than at the first glance will appear. Is it to be held that, if the Government in the pursuit of some important object, either the establishment of its rights, or the avenging its wrongs, shall pursue a course of measures, the indirect and undesigned tendency of which shall be to foster any particular species of industry, that thence it derives a claim to future encouragement and protection, even at the expense of all others? To what an infinite order of pledges would such a system give rise? Scarcely a single variation can be made in the ordinary policy of the nation but must engender an obligation of this kind. A change from peace to war necessarily injures the immediate interests of commerce and agriculture; a return of peace alike injures those institutions which grow up amid the circumstances of war. Is the nation, after all these changes and effects, to hold itself as bound to compensate the losses of those who may have suffered? I presume this will not be urged. But I may be told that the manufacturing class constitutes so small a portion of the community, that, while public policy requires it, they may be sustained by less injury to the others and less expense to the Government, and therefore they should be upheld. Sir, I deem it unsafe to legislate for particular interests. Did not the interest of the merchant and the planter suffer under those very causes which cherished the manufacturer? While the latter was accumulating wealth, were not the former consuming their capital? And because they now begin to derive a profit, is it wise and just in us to rob them of it by increasing the expenses of articles of consumption, merely to contribute such a bounty to the manufacturer as will enable him to derive something like his accustomed profits? And upon what evidence are you about to award the protection asked for? You are told by the persons interested, that, without some aid from the Government, it would be impossible for them to sustain the shock of foreign importations which threatens to overwhelm them. They exhibit to you no particular statements, but in general call for duties, almost amounting to prohibition, of the articles upon which they are laid. You are not advised of the expenses they have incurred in founding their establishments; of the price of labor to be employed in supporting them; of the costs of the raw material; of the profit which they are in the habit of enjoying, or which may be necessary for them to outlive the storm. But, in your munificence, you are about to allow, by way of bounty, five per cent. more than is required for revenue upon cottons and woollens, which is as much as the duties during the war, and one hundred per cent. more than those prior to the war. In words you are called upon for protection, but what are the ideas involved in this phrase? Why, that the planter of this country, who consumes the article manufactured, shall be made to pay the difference between the wages of labor in the factory and field, together with the difference of profit which superior skill in the foreign manufacturer gives over the manufacturer of this country. In one word, all articles are made dear to the consumer, whether of foreign or domestic fabrication, merely that the manufacturer may derive a profit upon his capital. Now, let me ask, said Mr. T., is the agriculture of this country in a condition sufficiently thriving to make this sacrifice? Are its profits and improvements such as to enable it to spare the amount required? Is the Government prepared to say that, after an expensive war which has embarrassed its finances, or the people, after the privations incident upon it, to admit, that it is wise to grant such a donation with no better evidence of its necessity, and no better proofs of its efficacy and policy than the testimony adduced? But the agriculturist in Europe—and if we commence the system of protection and favoritism, the agriculturist here—will be continually influenced by the selfish doctrines of this class of men, which have so often succeeded in inducing him to believe that their, and not his, was the public interest. Their policy is, and ever has been, to diminish competition, while they extended the sphere of their own market. Hence, every suggestion flowing from this class of the community, whatever be the individual integrity of character of its members, should be examined with scrupulousness and even suspicion.

The amount of surplus duty has been fairly, and has been truly, estimated at five millions of dollars; for, in estimating the sacrifices made by the people of this country, it is but just to add the amount laid beyond the requisitions of the revenue to the deficit which will arise from its operation as a prohibition to importations—for the latter must be made up by other objects of taxation; and, therefore, so much of the land, as well as other taxes as may be necessary to make up this deficit, may, and ought to be taken into the estimate which attempts to appreciate the bounty which the people have to pay, in order to satisfy the cupidity of a few manufacturers, and to give trial to the theory of a few politicians.

But the second consideration, and that which is most relied on, arises from the policy of other nations, and promises a more permanent security to the independence of this people. Imposing, indeed, is such a ground of argument; and if the independence of this nation either required or could be guarantied by this bill; abhorrent indeed would be all opposition to it; but, believing, as I do, that the liberties of this people, and the independence of this Government, rest on a basis too firmly laid in their very genius and nature to require such protection, for one I will not consent to adopt the measure proposed. After having advanced in prosperity and improvement far beyond the march of any other nation on the globe, in the same period of time, you are now called upon to reject the admonitions of experience, and adopt a part of the very policy which, with reference to the people of Europe, is congenial, because it denotes the absence of all ideas of self-government. You are about to abjure that principle which was peculiarly your own, and the offspring of freedom, of leaving industry free to its own pursuit and regulation, and to assume to yourself the capacity and right of judging and dictating that labor which is wisest and best for the people of this country. The extent of territory, the exuberance of our soil, the genius of our people, the principles of our political institutions, have in their combination decreed, as by a law of nature, that, for years to come, the citizens of America shall obtain their subsistence by agriculture and commerce. And we, in our wisdom, would fain issue a counter order, to withdraw industry from its natural and accustomed channels, and, by our laws, force into a state of prematurity the manufacturing enterprise of this country. But we are told it would be idle, weak, and absurd in us, while all the powers of Europe are devising plans for the encouragement of manufactures, to let them stagnate for want of national aid. To this I answer, that such are the profits and enjoyments flowing from labor in the ordinary pursuits of life with us, that you cannot draw off the citizen and tempt him to a new and less active pursuit, without robbing from the national wealth a considerable portion which is thrown in to make up his profits. Is not, then, the productive labor of the country thereby diminished? Has not a great portion of it been thrown away, unless some great benefit is derived from this new direction of industry? And is the policy of other Governments to be urged as sufficient justification? It must be borne in mind, that the circumstances of our country are totally different from those of Europe; there, a crowded population causes it to be an object of real national importance to discover means of employment for the many hands which would otherwise encumber society. With us, however, the case is widely different. Here, every hand would find ample employment in tilling the earth; and the calls of society are sufficient, without bounty, to give occupation to such as prefer other employments to those of agriculture. And every occupation which requires the aid of bounty, contains within itself a proof that it is not productive of national wealth, though it may be of national glory. I must protest against the habit of resorting to the regulations of other governments, as rules by which to quadrate our own. Because the Governments of the Old World have resorted to this mode of facilitating the collection of taxes by creating protuberances upon the body politic, are we to be influenced by their examples? Because monopolies have for ages become familiarized to them, are we to disregard the evidence in favor of an unshackled pursuit of our own interest, and in despite of the warning voice of these very nations, which attests the ruinous effects of such a policy upon every principle held sacred by the friends of freedom, are we to give aid to a favorite class of the community by a tax upon the rest? Like the State banks, sir, these manufactures grew up while a state of war gave a feverish heat to our political atmosphere, because the temporary wants of the people and the Government, and the sluggish state of trade, required them. The return of peace has diminished the demand for the paper of the one and the fabrics of the other; they may both be said to have depreciated in their relative value. The depreciation of bank paper, it is to be hoped, will be arrested in its progress, the combination of these moneyed monopolists broken as to all capacity for harm, by the establishment of a bank, governed in part by ourselves, and by other ulterior measures in contemplation. But, when the different manufacturing States may have deemed it wise to follow the example of Great Britain, and incorporate the different manufacturing establishments, grant them exclusive privileges, prop them by by-laws, and regard them as favorites, how, I ask, are you to control the mighty combination to which such a policy would give rise, for they can concert as well as the State banks? Will you, in such event, open the flood-gates, and let in the ocean of foreign goods threatening to overwhelm them? Certainly not; and yet this would be the only corrective left you.

Sir, while these establishments grow as other branches of industry have done, I shall feel for them no hostility; on the contrary, my preference would be given to articles manufactured by them; but their interest once identified with that of the Government, and I do fear them.

It has been remarked, that the arts flourish in the society of each other; not so, however, in their infancy, while both are attempted to be encouraged at the same time, do the manufactures and the navy spring up. For all the protection given to the former is a deduction from the support of the latter.

But my friend from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) reproaches us with a disposition to relapse into a state of ease—a generality of expression not easily definable. Is the doctrine which leaves industry to those pursuits which formed the heroes of New Orleans, braced their muscles and fired their souls, which developed a power to contest for the trident of the ocean, evincive of a disposition to countenance a course of ease? If ease and aversion to too much regulation on the part of Government mean the same thing, I am disposed to see it indulged for the benefit of this nation. If the contrary of ease means the state in which all Europe is concerned, then am I the more anxious to retain to this people that state of ease which defies too much regulation.

H. OF R.

Mr. GOLD.—The situation of the district which I have the honor to represent in this House, the numerous petitions which have been committed to me by my constituents, to be presented to the House for relief, under pressing embarrassments, make it my duty to address the House on this occasion.

It is not, Mr. Speaker, a distinct class of manufacturers who have petitioned Congress for relief, but almost all classes, and principally the farmers, have embarked in the manufacture of woollen and cotton, and now pray at your hands the protection of their interests, put in so great jeopardy. It is proper, I should state, after the example of some who have preceded me in debate, that I too have a concern in those manufactures.

Let not any honorable gentleman be alarmed by the apprehension that a general system of manufactures is about to be introduced; that this country is now to attempt the manufacture of the almost endless list of goods contained in the importer's invoice; no, sir, that is not the question, but simply, will you uphold the present manufactures of woollen and cotton, against the inundation of foreign fabrics, co-operating with the unexampled price of cotton, to their destruction?

The manufactures in question are, in the language of the President of the United States, who has in his Message so strongly recommended them to the protection of Congress, of primary want or necessity; they are indispensable to the community, and whenever the country shall be involved in war with Great Britain (from whom we receive our supplies, and with whom the relations of peace and trade are greatly exposed to interruption) the same disgraceful scenes of smuggling, fraud, and perjuries, will be reacted. This event is inevitable; there is no other resort; if the country does not furnish the goods, they will be procured from abroad. It is no light consideration, that our country supplies the raw material of both wool and cotton, while the whole of the former and about half of the latter, which enters into the manufacture of imported goods, are of foreign growth, and much of the cotton of an inferior quality.

Arkwright's machinery has produced a revolution in the manufacture of cotton; the invention is so excellent, the effect in saving labor so immense, that five or six men are sufficient for the management of a factory of two thousand spindles, spinning one hundred thousand pounds of twist or yarn yearly; the other hands are mere children, whose labor is of little use in any other branch of industry. The nation which does not avail itself of this machinery, and pays another nation for fabrics produced by it, sacrifices, in the situation the United States are now placed, the entire value of the abridged labor saved by the machinery. It is a maxim of political economy, laid down by Sir James Stewart, that "a nation ought to restrain, by duty on importation, that which may be produced at home, and to manufacture as much as possible of the raw material."

The same writer says, that a new manufacture cannot be established without encouragement, without restraint on importation; old establishments in possession of the ground, in possession of capital, (a most important consideration,) in possession of extended machinery, with all the fruits of experience in skill and economy, actuated by a jealousy against rival establishments, rising into competition, which never sleeps, never did cease, in any age or country, to exert their undivided force upon these rival establishments, and for a time to make sacrifices in the sale of their goods. The Government itself, not unfrequently lends itself by bounties on exports, to such unhallowed designs upon the manufactures of other nations; where these nations have, as is the case of the United States, been long the great customers and consumers of the fabrics of such Government. Is this mere declamation, or is the charge supported by facts, attested by the most respectable writers on political economy?

"Combinations by those engaged in a particular branch of business in one country to frustrate the first efforts to introduce it into another, by temporary sacrifices, recompensed, perhaps, by extraordinary indemnifications of the Government of such country, are believed to have existed, and are not to be regarded as destitute of probability. The existence or assurance of aid from the Government of the country, in which the business is to be introduced, may be essential to fortify adventurers against the dread of such combinations, to defeat their effects if formed, and to prevent their being formed, by demonstrating that they must in the end prove fruitless."

This is the language of Secretary Hamilton, one of the brightest stars in our political hemisphere, in his report to the House of Representatives, on manufactures, in the year 1791. He further says, in the same report—

"It is well known (and particular examples in the course of this report will be cited) that certain nations grant bounties on the exportation of particular commodities, to enable their own workmen to undersell and supplant all competitors in the country to which those commodities are sent."

The enlightened Secretary stands fully supported in his opinions by the annals of the Board of Trade of Great Britain, and in the correspondence of the Provincial Governors in America with that Board, (as recorded by Anderson on Commerce) for above half a century. The great Earl of Chatham, the least hostile of the British Ministry to America, in his speech in the House of Lords on the address to the King in 1770. (2d vol. of his life, p. 92,) declares his great alarm for the manufacturing interests of Great Britain, at the first efforts at manufactures in America. The same alarm was manifested at the non-importation associations of the American Colonies under the stamp act of 1765, and those associations forced from the Ministry the repeal of that darling measure.

Mr. Brougham, a distinguished British writer, in his "inquiry," published in 1803, states, that "the mere hat manufactory of Massachusetts was an object of jealousy to the British Legislature." He further states, that "statutes were passed in the reign of George the 2d, prohibiting the erection of furnaces, &c. in America."

An honorable member of this House from Connecticut, in his invaluable treatise on "Statistics," recently published, pages 5, 8, and 9, has given a just description of the continuing hostile policy of Great Britain to American manufactures.

Upon what other principle, sir, can it be, that hitherto double duties have added nothing to the price of cottons in the market?

I beg leave, sir, now to refer to the Parliamentary history of the interesting events which led to the entire exclusion of India cotton fabrics from consumption in Great Britain. In this we shall find a picture of our own times, the same causes occurring to oppress manufactures, and a remedy much more severe for the evil is now proposed. I refer, sir, to the 6th vol. page 877 and 941, of Anderson's Commerce, continued by Combe, under the year 1787. From this history the following facts appear:

That Arkwright's machinery, then recently invented, had produced a revolution in the cotton manufacture.

That such are the difficulties attending the establishment of new manufactures, that, had India cottons continued to be imported it would have destroyed the cotton manufactures of Great Britain.

That the East India Company actually reduced the prices of their goods above 20 per cent., for the purpose of underselling and ruining the British manufacture.

This same East India Company is now raising the same weapon against the American manufactures, aided in this by Great Britain, which that Company wielded against the British in 1787, and the effect in prostrating them is as certain. If the British factories could not stand against the East India importation, how is it possible that the American can?

The present ruinous state of our cotton factories, and that many of them are wholly suspended, others partially, must be known to many members of this House, who have no concern in the establishments. He who listens to and acts upon suggestions to the contrary, will hereafter experience deep regret.

I proceed to notice some objections to encouraging manufactures. It is said, that "industry ought to be left free to its own course." Now, sir, this is true or false, according to circumstances. Like most maxims, it is to be received with qualifications and exceptions. If other nations adopt the rule, it is generally true; but if a nation like Great Britain shall swell her negotiations on manufactures and commerce into a system—into volumes—secured by severe penalties, assuming to manufacture for the world, and excluding the manufactures of all the world; if this great policy is pursued with a steady eye from century to century, by which a wealth and power is acquired that no nation of so small territory ever attained, does the maxim apply?

So severe was the regulation in Great Britain, that cloth of foreign wool was by statute, in the reign of Henry II., required to be burned. All attempts to transfer her artisans or the instruments of manufacture to other nations are severely punished. At times a bounty is given on the export of goods, as well as on the import of the raw material. As to India cotton fabrics, the admission for consumption is prohibited in France, Holland, and other European Governments, as well as by Great Britain.

Agriculture is certainly the great and favorite theatre of industry in the United States, and, so long as our surplus products can find a good foreign market, it should be the first object. But, how is this fact? With the exception of a period of war, no such market is found, and the grain of our country raised beyond consumption must rot in the granary. Lord Sheffield, in his American Commerce, (page 20,) states that there never was a good market for American flour and wheat for more than three or four years. Though Europe is not recovered from the shock of war, yet Great Britain is now giving a bounty on the export of grain. Where can the United States now look for a market for her grain equal to that at home?

No friend of his country can look at the enormous importation of goods into the United States, the past year, without concern. The British accounts give thirty millions sterling (above one hundred and thirty millions of dollars) as the amount of her export of goods to the United States, while our whole export to Great Britain is twenty-one millions only. Is it possible to see such a course of trade in any other light than as most ruinous to the country? "If the balance of trade be against a nation, it is her interest to put a stop to it," is the language of Sir James Stewart. To ascertain the exact balance of trade is always difficult, but it is manifest that the United States cannot continue this present course of trade with Great Britain half a dozen years without ruinous consequences. The trade of the United States with Great Britain has always been, in the opinion of both countries, as against the United States; but the balance against the United States was reimbursed by the favorable trade with the West Indies and other ports, which are now in a great degree closed on us. The British Government appears at length to have adopted a new course of policy, strongly recommended by Mr. Anderson, the commercial advocate of her American provinces, who published his book in 1814. By this policy the United States are to be excluded from the commerce of the British West Indies, and resort is to be had to the Canadas and New Brunswick for supplies for the West Indies. Hence, very heavy duties are laid on the admission of cargoes in American ships, and our commerce is to be hedged in on every side.

The importation of cotton goods into the United States from British possessions has been much greater than is generally supposed. In each of the years 1806 and 1807, it was, from England, nineteen millions of dollars; from Scotland and Calcutta, about five millions. During the last year the importation must have been nearly double this amount.

APRIL, 1816.

The Tariff.

H. OF R.

It is further objected, that our manufacturers will extort extravagant prices, and the prices during the last year are referred to in support of the objection. Is this charge against manufacturers just? Does not every member of this Committee know that the charge applies equally against all classes during the late war? Did not the merchant who had cloths on hand profit equally by the times? Did he not impose 100 per cent. profit on his peace importation? Was not the settled order of things unhinged by the war, and did not all classes exact the most extravagant prices? If the manufacture of cottons were a mystery, confined to a few, there might be foundation for the objection; but, the fact is, the manufacture is simple—machine makers greatly multiplied—and the manufacture is now actually spread over more than half of the United States. It began in the East, has spread to the West, and has now actually passed the mountains. Instead of concert to raise prices, competition and the spirit of underselling prevail to such an extent, that sales are often made without a profit.

Justice to different portions of the Union, and the harmony of the whole, require the encouragement of manufactures.

While the South has, from the export of her cotton and tobacco alone, received about thirty millions the last year, the Northern and Middle States, having no such great staples, must of necessity turn their attention to manufacturing; or become greatly impoverished, to the injury of the whole. The relinquishment of the port duties by the Northern and Middle States, to the amount of nearly three-fourths of the customs, by the adoption of the Constitution, creates an equitable claim to such an adjustment of the duties as shall favor and protect the interests of those States.

The amount of duties now proposed on cottons and woollens will be found, on examination, to be less than the average of the specific duties. The reason of the former low duties on woollens and cottons will be found in the consideration that at that time the manufacture had not been in any degree established in the United States. Had the manufacture been established to the extent it is now, instead of the lowest, a much higher rate of duties would have been imposed.

MR. INGHAM spoke in reply to the statements and arguments offered by MR. GASTON yesterday.

MR. MASON again advocated a high duty, and moved to strike out the limitation of two years to the twenty-five per cent. and insert four years. This motion was negatived—ayes 67, noes 72.

MR. SMITH, of Maryland, then proposed to make the limit of the twenty-five per cent. duty three years, instead of two.

This motion was carried, ayes 79, noes 71—and then the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended, (twenty-five per cent. for three years, and twenty per cent. thereafter,) was agreed to by a large majority.

The House then proceeded with the remaining amendments of the Committee of the Whole.

On the question of agreeing with the committee on reducing the duty on imported iron from seventy-five to 45 cents per one hundred weight, MR. BURNSIDE demanded the yeas and nays, and the amendment was concurred in—for the amendment 89, against it 51, as follows:

Wilson, William Wilson, and Yates—51.

In the progress of the House through the other amendments of the Committee, MR. HOPKINSON made an unsuccessful motion to raise the duty on shot to three cents per pound. The duty originally was one cent, and raised by the Committee to two cents.

The House disagreed to the amendment respecting lead, dry or ground in oil, &c., and restored the duty to three cents per pound.

MR. STEARNS moved that the amendment of the Committee which reduced the duty on brown sugar to three and a half cents per pound be amended, by further reducing the duty to two cents per pound. This motion was decided, by yeas and nays, in the affirmative—for the amendment 86, against it 56, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baer, Bateman, Baylies, Bennett, Birdsall, Boss, Bradbury, Brooks, Burnside, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clarke of N. Carolina, Clayton, Clendennin, Comstock, Cooper, Crawford, Crocheron, Culpeper, Darlington, Davenport, Edwards, Forney, Gaston, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Grosvenor, Hahn, Hale, Heister, Herbert, Hopkinson, Huger, Hungerford, Jewett, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, King of North Carolina, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Love, Lovett, Maclay, Marsh, McKee, Milnor, Moseley, Nelson of Massachusetts, Nelson of Virginia, Noyes, Parris, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Pleasants, Randolph, Reed, Roane, Ross, Ruggles, Sergeant, Savage, Sheffey, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Stearns, Sturges, Taggart, Townsend, Vose, Wallace, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Webster, Wendover, Whiteside, Wilcox, Wilkin, Willoughby, William Wilson, Woodward, Wright, and Yancey—86.

And the amendment of the Committee, as amended, was agreed to without a division.

The duty on lump sugar, on motion of Mr. SMITH of Maryland, was then reduced to ten cents per pound, instead of twelve, as reported by the Committee of the Whole.

The House disagreed to the amendment of the Committee in the duty on wine, and restored it to one dollar per gallon on London particular Madeira, and eighty cents per gallon on all other Madeira.

A motion was made by Mr. PICKERING, so to amend the proviso adopted by the Committee respecting India cottons, as to admit all importations from India, within one year after the 30th June next, on their paying 25 per cent. on the cost of the goods in India, with the addition of the usual 20 per cent.; in other words, to reduce the amount to the old double duty.

Mr. P. advocated his motion at some length, and was supported with zeal by Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, who argued that it would be unjust to ruin one class of citizens to benefit another, which would be the effect, if those merchants who had sent out orders to India were subjected to the heavy duty reported by the Committee.

Before the question on this amendment was taken, a motion was made and carried to adjourn.

THURSDAY, April 4.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill declaring the assent of Congress to acts of the State of South Carolina, authorizing the City Council of Charleston to impose and collect a duty on the tonnage of vessels from foreign ports; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means upon the subject of revenue.

The bill from the Senate, "supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads within the District of Columbia,'" was read twice, and committed to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

NATIONAL BANK.

The House took up for consideration the amendments of the Senate to the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States. After the amendments had been read—

Mr. CALHOUN observed, that he had examined the amendments; that they were not important; and hoped the question would be put on them generally.

Mr. RANDOLPH objected to so sudden a decision on the amendments; at so early an hour, too, when the House was thin, and before they had been printed. He moved that the consideration of the amendments be postponed until to-morrow.

This motion, after some further conversation between Messrs. CALHOUN and RANDOLPH, was agreed to—ayes 60, noes 55.

THE TARIFF.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill to regulate the duties on imports—Mr. PICKERING's motion to reduce the proposed duty on India cottons, to the rate of the present double duties, for one year from June next, being still under consideration.

Mr. PICKERING modified his motion by substituting the 1st of March for the 30th of June, 1817, as the period within which vessels arriving, and which sailed from the United States before the 1st of February last, are to be allowed the benefit of the amendment.

Mr. P. added some remarks to those he offered yesterday in support of his motion, and in explanation of the difference of opinion on the subject between gentlemen from the Eastern States.

Mr. MASON spoke a short time in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, read a letter on the subject from certain merchants in New York, and offered some commercial explanations, without pointedly opposing, though not in favor of the amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH made some general remarks on the trade affected by the proposed amendment, and on the inconsistency of the policy formerly and now pursued on the subject of commerce. He declared his unwillingness to sacrifice the bona fide American merchants to what he called the mushroom interest which had sprung into favor; and argued, at some length, and with some invective, against the object of the bill, which he characterized as a scheme of public robbery; and concluded his remarks by moving the indefinite postponement of the whole subject.

After some conversation on the subject, Mr. RANDOLPH withdrew his motion, with the declaration, that it had been made upon mature reflection, and that he should offer it at another stage of the business.

Mr. WEBSTER advocated Mr. PICKERING's amendment, as an act of strict justice to those who had embarked in the India trade before the policy of the Government on the subject of manufactures had disclosed itself, and before they had any reason to expect so great and sudden a change in that policy, and argued to show that its adoption would not injure the manufacturing interest, as the goods now ordered would, in any event, arrive in the country, and, being selected particularly for this market, must be consumed here, no matter at what loss to the importer.

Mr. TELFAIR opposed the amendment; protesting against taxing the community one day to foster the interest of the manufacturers, and on the next to secure to the mercantile class a high profit, and against legislating for particular cases instead of on a general and national scale.

Mr. WRIGHT argued a short time on the same side.

Mr. INGHAM, though very friendly to the manufacturers, thought the amendment fair and reasonable, and such a one as ought to be adopted.

Mr. HULBERT, also, though very friendly to the manufacturers, concurred in opinion with Mr. INGHAM, and thought the amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. PITKIN supported the amendment on the same grounds.

Mr. PICKERING replied to the argument of Mr. TELFAIR, and argued further in support of his amendment.

Mr. HOPKINSON supported the amendment at some length, on the ground of justice to the merchants concerned, declaring that it was giving them no more than, under similar circumstances, would be granted to them by an enemy; which point he supported by various arguments and illustrations.

The question on the amendment was then decided in the affirmative by a large majority; the word "nineteen" being substituted therein in lieu of "twenty-five," on motion of Mr. CHAMPION, and the amendment was adopted in the following words:

"Provided, That cotton piece-goods of India, imported in ships or vessels of the United States, which shall have sailed from the United States before the first day of February last, and shall arrive therein between the 30th of June, 1816, and the first of March, 1817, (the original cost of which cotton piece-goods, at the place whence imported, shall have been less than twenty-five cents per square yard) shall be admitted to entry, subject only to a duty of 33½ per cent. on the cost of the said cotton piece-goods in India, and on the usual addition of twenty per cent. on that cost."

The remaining amendments reported to the bill by the Committee of the Whole having been successively concurred in—

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out so much of the proviso of the second section as fixes the minimum price of cotton goods (except nankeens directly from China) at twenty-five cents per square yard.

Mr. R. then entered into a pretty wide discussion of his motion, avowing his willingness to encourage, as far as was proper, those manufactures of cloths conducted in the families of our citizens, and argued against the propriety of promoting the manufacturing establishments to the extent, and in the manner proposed by the bill, and against laying up eight thousand tons of shipping now employed in the East India trade, and levying an immense tax on one portion of the community to put money into the pockets of another.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The debate heretofore on this subject, has been on the degree of protection which ought to be afforded to our cotton and woollen manufactures; all professing to be friendly to those infant establishments, and to be willing to extend to them adequate encouragement. The present motion assumes a new aspect. It is introduced professedly on the ground that manufactures ought not to receive any encouragement, and will, in its operation, leave our cotton establishments exposed to the competition of the cotton goods of the East Indies, which, it is acknowledged on all sides, they are not capable of meeting with success, without the proviso proposed to be stricken out by the motion now under discussion. Until the debate assumed this new form, he had determined to be silent; participating, as he largely did, in that general anxiety which is felt, after so long and laborious a session, to return to the bosom of our families. But on a subject of such vital importance, touching, as it does, the security and permanent prosperity of our country, he hoped that the House would indulge him in a few observations. He regretted much his want of preparation—he meant not a verbal preparation, for he had ever despised such, but that due and mature meditation and arrangement of thought, which the House is entitled to on the part of those who occupy any portion of their time. But whatever his arguments might want on that account in weight, he hoped might be made up in the disinterestedness of his situation. He was no manufacturer; he was not from that portion of our country supposed to be peculiarly interested. Coming, as he did, from the South, having, in common with his immediate constituents, no interest but in the cultivation of the soil, in selling its products high, and buying cheap the wants and conveniences of life, no motive could be attributed to him but such as were disinterested.

He had asserted, that the subject before them was connected with the security of the country. It would, doubtless, by some be considered a rash assertion, but he conceived it to be susceptible of the clearest proof, and he hoped, with due attention, to establish it to the satisfaction of the House.

The security of a country mainly depends on its spirit and its means; and the latter principally on its moneyed resources. Modified as the industry of this country now is, combined with our peculiar situation, and want of a naval ascendancy, whenever we have the misfortune to be involved in a war with a nation dominant on the ocean, and it is almost only with such we can at present be, the moneyed resources of the country, to a great extent, must fail. He took it for granted, that it was the duty of this body to adopt those measures of prudent foresight which the event of war made necessary. We cannot, he presumed, be indifferent to dangers from abroad, unless, indeed, the House is prepared to indulge in the phantom of eternal peace, which seemed to possess the dream of some of its members. Could such a state exist, no foresight or fortitude would be necessary to conduct the affairs of the Republic; but as it is the mere illusion of the imagination—as every people, who ever has or ever will exist, are subjected to the vicissitudes of peace and war, it must ever be considered as the plain dictate of wisdom, in peace to prepare for war. What, then, let us consider, constitute the resources of this country, and what are the effects of war on them? Commerce and agriculture, till lately, almost the only, still constitute the principal sources of our wealth. So long as these remain uninterrupted, the country prospers; but war, as we are now circumstanced, is equally destructive to both. They both depend on foreign markets, and our country is placed, as it regards them, in a situation strictly insular; a wide ocean rolls between. Our commerce neither is or can be protected by the present means of the country. What, then, are the effects of a war with a maritime Power—with England? Our commerce annihilated, spreading individual misery, and producing national poverty; our agriculture cut off from its accustomed markets, the surplus product of the farmer perishes on his hands; and he ceases to produce, because he cannot sell. His resources are dried up, while his expenses are greatly increased; as all manufactured articles, the necessities as well as the conveniences of life, rise to an extravagant price. The recent war fell with peculiar pressure on the growers of cotton and tobacco, and other great staples of the country; and the same state of things will recur in the event of another, unless prevented by the foresight of this body. If the mere statement of facts did not carry conviction to any mind, as he conceived it is calculated to do, additional arguments might be drawn from the general nature of wealth. Neither agriculture, manufactures, nor commerce, taken separately, is the cause of wealth; it flows from the three combined, and cannot exist without each. The wealth of any single nation, or any individual, it is true, may not immediately depend on the three, but such wealth always presupposes their existence. He viewed the words in the most enlarged sense. Without commerce, industry would have no stimulus; without manufactures, it would be without the means of production; and without agriculture, neither of the others can subsist. When separated entirely and permanently, they perish. War in this country produces, to a great extent, that effect; and hence the great embarrassments which follow in its train. The failure of the wealth and resources of the nation necessarily involved the ruin of its finances and its currency. It is admitted, by the most strenuous advocates on the other side, that no country ought to be dependent on another for its means of defence; that, at least, our musket and bayonet, our cannon and ball, ought to be of domestic manufacture. But what, he asked, is more necessary to the defence of a country than its currency and finance? Circumstanced as our country is, can these stand the shock of war? Behold the effect of the late war on them! When our manufactures are grown to a certain perfection, as they soon will under the fostering care of Government, we will no longer experience these evils. The farmer will find a ready market for his surplus produce; and, what is almost of equal consequence, a certain and cheap supply of all his wants. His prosperity will diffuse itself to every class in the community; and instead of that languor of industry, and individual distress now incident to a state of war, and suspended commerce, the wealth and vigor of the community will not be materially impaired. The arm of Government will be nerved, and taxes in the hour of danger, when essential to the independence of the nation, may be greatly increased; loans, so uncertain and hazardous, may be less relied on; thus situated, the storm may beat without, but within all will be quiet and safe. To give perfection to this state of things, it will be necessary to add, as soon as possible, a system of internal improvements, and at least such an extension of our navy as will prevent the cutting off our coasting trade. The advantage of each is so striking, as not to require illustration, especially after the experience of the recent war. It is thus the resources of this Government and people would be placed beyond the power of a foreign war materially to impair. But it may be said, that the derangement then experienced resulted, not from the cause assigned, but from the errors or the weakness of the Government. He admitted that many financial blunders were committed, for the subject was new to us; that the taxes were not laid sufficiently early, or to as great an extent as they ought to have been; and that the loans were in some instances injudiciously made; but he ventured to affirm, that had the greatest foresight and fortitude been exerted, the embarrassment would have been still very great; and that even under the best management, the total derangement which was actually felt would not have been postponed eighteen months, had the war so long continued. How could it be otherwise? A war, such as this country was then involved in, in a great measure dries up the resources of individuals, as he had already proved; and the resources of the Government are no more than the aggregate of the surplus incomes of individuals, called into action by a system of taxation. It is certainly a great political evil, incident to the character of the industry of this country, that, however prosperous our situation when at peace, with uninterrupted commerce, and nothing then could exceed it, the moment that we were involved in war the whole is reversed. When resources are most needed; when indispensable to maintain the honor, yes, the very existence of the nation, then they desert us. Our currency is also sure to experience the shock, and becomes so deranged, as to prevent us from calling out fairly whatever of means is left to the country. The result of a war in the present state of our naval power, is the blockade of our seacoast, and consequent destruction of our trade. The wants and habits of the country, founded on the use of foreign articles, must be gratified; importation to a certain extent continues, through the policy of the enemy, or unlawful traffic; the exportation of our bulky articles is prevented, too; the specie of the country is drawn to pay the balance perpetually accumulating against us; and the final result is a total derangement of our currency.

APRIL, 1816.

The Tariff.

H. OF R.

To this distressing state of things there were two remedies, and only two; one in our power immediately, the other requiring much time and exertion; but both constituting, in his opinion, the essential policy of this country; he meant the Navy, and domestic manufactures. By the former, we could open the way to our markets; by the latter, we bring them from beyond the ocean, and naturalize them. Had we the means of attaining an immediate naval ascendancy, he acknowledged that the policy recommended by this bill would be very questionable; but as this is not the fact—as it is a period remote, with any exertion, and will be probably more so, from that relaxation of exertion, so natural in peace, when necessity is not felt, it became the duty of this House to resort, to a considerable extent, at least as far as is proposed, to the only remaining remedy. But to this it has been objected, that the country is not prepared, and that the result of our premature exertion would be to bring distress on it, without effecting the intended object. Were it so, however urgent the reasons in its favor, we ought to desist, as it is folly to oppose the laws of necessity. But he could not for a moment yield to the assertion; on the contrary, he firmly believed that the country is prepared, even to maturity, for the introduction of manufactures. We have abundance of resources, and things naturally tend at this moment in that direction. A prosperous commerce has poured an immense amount of commercial capital into this country. This capital has, until lately, found occupation in commerce; but that state of the world which transferred it to this country, and gave it active employment, has passed away, never to return. Where shall we now find full employment for our prodigious amount of tonnage; where markets for the numerous and abundant products of our country? This great body of active capital, which for the moment has found sufficient employment in supplying our markets, exhausted by the war, and measures preceding it, must find a new direction; it will not be idle. What channel can it take but that of manufactures? This, if things continue as they are, will be its direction. It will introduce a new era in our affairs, in many respects highly advantageous, and ought to be countenanced by the Government. Besides, we have already surmounted the greatest difficulty that has ever been found in undertakings of this kind. The cotton and woollen manufactures are not to be introduced—they are already introduced to a great extent; freeing us entirely from the hazards, and, in a great measure, the sacrifices experienced in giving the capital of the country a new direction. The restrictive measures and the war, though not intended for that purpose, have, by the necessary operation of things, turned a large amount of capital to this new branch of industry. He had often heard it said, both in and out of Congress, that this effect alone would indemnify the country for all of its losses. So high was this tone of feeling, when the want of these establishments were practically felt, that he remembered, during the war, when some question was agitated respecting the introduction of foreign goods, that many then opposed it on the ground of injuring our manufactures. He then said that war alone furnished sufficient stimulus, and perhaps too much, as it would make their growth unnaturally rapid; but, that on the return of peace, it would then be time to show our affection for them. He at that time did not expect an apathy and aversion to the extent which is now seen. But it will no doubt be said, if they are so far established, and if the situation of the country is so favorable to their growth, where is the necessity of affording them protection? It is to put them beyond the reach of contingency. Besides, capital is not yet, and cannot, for some time, be adjusted to the new state of things. There is, in fact, from the operation of temporary causes, a great pressure on these establishments. They had extended so rapidly during the late war, that many, he feared, were without the requisite surplus capital or skill to meet the present crisis. Should such prove to be the fact, it would give a back set, and might, to a great extent, endanger their ultimate success. Should the present owners be ruined, and the workmen dispersed and turn to other pursuits, the country would sustain a great loss. Such would, no doubt, be the fact to a considerable extent, if not protected. Besides, circumstances, if we act with wisdom, are favorable to attract to our country much skill and industry. The country in Europe having the most skilful workmen is broken up. It is to us, if wisely used, more valuable than the repeal of the Edict of Nantz was to England. She had the prudence to profit by it; let us not discover less political sagacity. Afford to ingenuity and industry immediate and ample protection, and they will not fail to give a preference to this free and happy country.

It has been objected to this bill, that it will injure our marine, and consequently impair our naval strength. How far it is fairly liable to this charge, he was not prepared to say. He hoped and believed it would not, at least to any alarming extent, have that effect immediately; and he firmly believed that its lasting operation would be highly beneficial to our commerce. The trade to the East Indies would certainly be much affected; but it was stated in debate that the whole of that trade employed but six hundred sailors. But whatever might be the loss in this, or other branches of our foreign commerce, he trusted it would be amply compensated in our coasting trade—a branch of navigation wholly in our own hands. It has at all times employed a great amount of tonnage, something more, he believed, than one-third of the whole; nor is it liable to the imputation thrown out by a member from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON,) that it produced inferior sailors. It required long and dangerous voyages; and, if his information was correct, no branch of trade made better or more skilful seamen. The fact that it is wholly in our own hands is a very important one, while every branch of our foreign trade must suffer from competition with other nations. Other objections, of a political character, were made to the encouragement of manufactures. It is said they destroy the moral and physical power of the people. This might formerly have been true to a considerable extent, before the perfection of machinery, and when the success of the manufactures depended on the minute subdivision of labor. At that time it required a large portion of the population of a country to be engaged in them; and every minute subdivision of labor is undoubtedly unfavorable to the intellect; but the great perfection of machinery has in a considerable degree obviated these objections. In fact it has been stated that the manufacturing districts in England furnish the greatest number of recruits to her army, and that, as soldiers, they are not materially inferior to the rest of her population. It has been further asserted that manufactures are the fruitful cause of pauperism, and England has been referred to as furnishing conclusive evidence of its truth. For his part, he could perceive no such tendency in them, but the exact contrary, as they furnished new stimulus and means of subsistence to the laboring classes of the community. We ought not to look to the cotton and woollen establishments of Great Britain for the prodigious numbers of poor with which her population was disgraced. Causes much more efficient exist. Her poor laws, and statutes regulating the price of labor, with heavy taxes, were the real causes. But if it must be so; if the mere fact that England manufactured more than any other country, explained the cause of her having more beggars, it is just as reasonable to refer her courage, spirit, and all her masculine virtues, in which she excels all other nations, with a single exception—he meant our own—in which we might without vanity challenge a pre-eminence. Another objection had been made, which he must acknowledge was better founded, that capital employed in manufacturing produced a greater dependence on the part of the employed, than in commerce, navigation, or agriculture. It is certainly an evil, and to be regretted; but he did not think it a decisive objection to the system, especially when it had incidental political advantages which, in his opinion, more than counterpoised it. It produced an interest strictly American, as much so as agriculture; in which it had the decided advantage of commerce or navigation. The country will from this derive much advantage. Again, it is calculated to bind together more closely our widely-spread Republic. It will greatly increase our mutual dependence and intercourse; and will, as a necessary consequence, excite an increased attention to internal improvement—a subject every way so intimately connected with the ultimate attainment of national strength, and the perfection of our political institutions. He regarded the fact that it would make the parts adhere more closely; that it would form a new and most powerful cement, far outweighing any political objections that might be urged against the system. In his opinion the liberty and the union of the country were inseparably united. That as the destruction of the latter would most certainly involve the former, so its maintenance will with equal certainty preserve it. He did not speak lightly. He had often and long revolved it in his mind, and he had critically examined into the causes that destroyed the liberty of other States. There are none that apply to us, or apply with a force to alarm. The basis of our Republic is too broad, and its structure too strong to be shaken by them. Its extension and organization will be found to afford effectual security against their operation; but let it be deeply impressed on the heart of this House and country, that while they guarded against the old, they exposed us to a new and terrible danger—disunion. This single word comprehended almost the sum of our political dangers; and against it we ought to be perpetually guarded.

Mr. CUTHBERT answered briefly some of Mr. CALHOUN's arguments.

Mr. RANDOLPH entered into a more particular reply to Mr. CALHOUN, and further arguments in support of his opinions.

Mr. GASTON also spoke some time in reply to Mr. CALHOUN, and in support of the opinions and statements he advanced on the subject on a former occasion.

Mr. NEWTON, in a speech of about two hours, advocated the bill and the protection therein proposed to our manufactures, entering into a full discussion of the general question of promoting domestic fabrics.

Mr. HALE moved to modify the motion by reducing the minimum price specifically to fifteen cents per square yard.

This motion was decided in the negative—ayes 66, noes 72; and the question recurred on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion to strike out the minimum price altogether.

Mr. WILDE rose, about 4 o'clock, and submitted his views on the subject, in opposition to the bill. He had proceeded about an hour, when Mr. RANDOLPH withdrew his amendment, believing, from the decision on Mr. HALE's motion, that the House would not go still further and agree to his amendment.

Mr. WILDE then, for the purpose of accommodating the bill to his views, and to enable him to vote for it, moved an amendment, substantially, to substitute an ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. on woollen and cotton goods, and then resumed the thread of his speech in opposition to higher duties. Mr. W. concluded his remarks about half past 5 o'clock.

Mr. MASON made a few remarks in reply, when

The question on Mr. WILDE's proposition was decided in the negative—ayes 51, nays 76, as follows:

Mr. Ross then moved further to amend the said bill, by striking out from the fifty-sixth line of the first section (being the first line of the fifth clause) the word "thirty," and to insert "twenty;" when the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 5.

On motion of Mr. BERTS, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an uniform mode of trial and punishment for all crimes and offences properly cognizable by the courts of the United States.

NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. CALHOUN moved that the House proceed to consider the amendments of the Senate to the National Bank bill. On putting the question, however, it was found that a quorum of members were not present.

Mr. RANDOLPH, with the view of producing a more punctual attendance hereafter, moved that the House adjourn.—Negatived.

A quorum soon after appearing, Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the rule for convening at 10 o'clock, be rescinded, that the hour of 11 might be again adopted; which was also disagreed to.—Ayes 40.

The House then, by a vote of 55 to 45 agreed to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bank bill.

Mr. MILNOR, because of the thinness of the House and the importance of the subject; further, because he understood that the Committee on the National Currency were on the point of reporting a very important bill, which might materially affect the decision on the bank question, &c., moved that the consideration thereof be postponed to Monday next.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped the motion would not prevail. The reasons for it he did not think sufficient; the House was as full as usual; and the bill alluded to as on the eve of being reported by the committee, presupposed the existence of a National Bank, and the committee had determined not to report it pending the passage of the Bank bill.

After some further conversation between Messrs. CALHOUN and MILNOR, in which the latter gentleman insisted on the propriety of first being in possession of the report referred to, the motion to postpone the subject to Monday, was negatived—ayes 43, noes 66.

After the amendments of the Senate were read, Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the bill and amendments be indefinitely postponed, avowedly for the purpose of destroying the bill. Mr. R. supported his motion, by adverting to the small number of members present, and the impropriety of passing, by a screwed-up, strained, and costive majority, so important a measure, at the end of a session, when the members were worn down and exhausted by a daily and long attention to business; a measure, which, in a time of war and of great public emergency, could not be forced through the House; a measure so deeply involving the future welfare, and which was to give a color and character to the future destiny of this country; a measure which, if it and another, (the tariff) should pass into laws, the present session would be looked back to as the most disastrous since the commencement of the Republic; and which, much as he deprecated war, he would prefer war itself to either of them. Mr. R. then proceeded to argue against the bill as unconstitutional, inexpedient, and dangerous.

Mr. CALHOUN said, it certainly could not be expected of him to enter into so untimely and unnecessary a discussion of the general question. The bill had been before the House three weeks, when it was maturely considered; it was sent to the Senate; and now comes back with a few unimportant amendments, on which the House had to pass. It was unfair to say, that the bill was urged through the House improperly; and the gentleman was mistaken also in stating, that a bank bill could not be passed at the last session; it was notorious that a bill to establish a National Bank did pass at the last session, and was rejected by the President of the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR did not know what the gentleman meant by a hard-screwed majority. He would venture to say that the House had advanced on this subject with as much deliberation and calmness as they ever did on any public matter whatever; the bill was not pressed through improperly. The pressure talked of by the gentleman was in fact directly the other way. With two hundred State institutions bearing down on the members of this House, it required something more than common firmness, it required boldness to urge the bill. This influence would every day become stronger, and if the subject was deferred to the next session its passage would be impossible. He had never since he came to Congress known a bill passed with more ample discussion; the gentleman from Virginia had himself taken a part, an able part in it. It was not smuggled through the House; a fair majority had passed it, and he was convinced, from information he received, that if the people themselves could be consulted, there would be ten to one in favor of it. Mr. G. answered some of Mr. RANDOLPH's objections to the principles of the bill; declaring his difference from that gentleman on the Constitutional question; and his belief of its necessity to the safety of the country. The Constitutional question had been long since put to sleep by the repeated decisions of all the proper authorities, after mature reflection, and ought never again to be revived.

Mr. RANDOLPH replied to Mr. GROSVENOR, and enforced his Constitutional objections to the bill, in which he was borne out by the decision of Congress in refusing to renew the charter of the old bank, which decision was grounded on the want of Constitutional power. He adverted also, in support of his opinion, to the instructions from the Legislatures of Virginia and Kentucky, to their Senators, to vote against the old bank; which instructions were given on the ground of that institution being unconstitutional. Mr. R. declared himself the holder of no stock whatever, except live stock, and had determined never to own any; but if this bill passed, he would not only be a stockholder to the utmost of his power, but would advise every man, over whom he had any influence, to do the same, because it was the creation of a great privileged order of the most hateful kind to his feelings, and because he would rather be the master than the slave. If he must have a master, let him be one with epaulettes, something that he could fear and respect, something that he could look up to—but not a master with a quill behind his ear.

Mr. WEBSTER said this was a subject on which a great change of opinion had taken place on both sides of the House; and animadverted on what he called a compromise of principle on a great moneyed institution; and the desertion, not only of principles but of friends, which had characterized the proceedings on this bill. He then spoke some time against the bill, which he pointedly condemned, on account of the participation of the Government in its direction and management. If, said he, instead of the little scraps of amendments which were very well as far as they went, but very trifling, and only served to cover the vice and deformity of the scheme, the Senate had returned the bill healthy, in all the beauty of the original institution, it would have passed through the House swifter than the current of the Potomac.

Mr. HULBERT replied to Mr. WEBSTER, in defence of the bill and of the course he had pursued in relation to it. He disavowed any compromise of opinion either in the principle or the details of the bill. He had sought the best lights to guide him in deciding on this bill; he had listened to the gentleman from New Hampshire as one who would, if any could, point out its defects and convince him of its danger; but the only objection he heard from that gentleman was the Government direction. That objection, Mr. H. said, was not with him a strong one; and he was free to say that if he had the power of legislating at his will he would hesitate before he gave any class of men the control of an institution of thirty-five millions of dollars, without reserving to the Government a strong check on them. Mr. H. protested with warmth against the proscription which had been denounced against those who did not on this subject go with the majority of that party in the House opposed to the Administration. He disclaimed any such influence over his public conduct; he came here to act according to his own sincere convictions, and should despise himself if he could submit to act as this or that side of the House pointed its finger. Mr. H. concluded by declaring his support of the bank bill to be disinterested; he expected to hold not a cent's worth of its stock, as he was not able so to do—but the bank he believed would be a great benefit to the country.

Mr. WRIGHT said he was one of those who had aided in putting down the old bank, and was sure that, a thousand years after he was buried, his vote on that occasion would be a monumental proof of his worth and his regard for the best interests of his country. He opposed it on the ground of inexpediency as well as unconstitutionality; but the Supreme Judicial tribunal had decided on its constitutionality by often recognising it as a party, and it was now too late to insist on the objection. Mr. W. argued some time in favor of the bill; and, adverting to Mr. RANDOLPH'S epithet that the bank was a scheme of public robbery, and his declared intention to hold as much of its stock as he could, Mr. W. said his friend from Virginia ought to recollect that the receiver was always considered as bad as the thief.

Mr. HARDIN next delivered at length his views of the question; objecting to the plan of the bank as embraced in this bill, on Constitutional grounds as well as from a belief of its inexpediency. He was a member of the Kentucky Legislature at the time, and was one of those who had instructed its Senators to vote against the old bank because of its unconstitutionality, and his opinion remained unchanged, though he perceived some of those who had acted with him in the case alluded to, had changed their opinion and were now supporters of the bank.

Mr. SHARPE spoke in reply to the remarks of Mr. HARDIN, respecting the instructions from the Kentucky Legislature, and justified his opinions on the subject of the bank.

Mr. SOUTHARD made a few remarks, principally to show that it was not on the ground of unconstitutionality that Congress had refused to renew the charter of the old bank, and that it had been recognised by the courts.

Mr. GROSVENOR replied to the observations of Mr. WEBSTER in a decided manner. He denied the right of that gentleman to lecture other members of the House for the course which their duty prescribed to them. As to the changes of principle, of which the gentleman had spoken, Mr. G. said he did not mean to inquire whether the gentlemen on the other side of the House had acted consistently; but this he knew, that last year the gentleman had been proud to shake hands with them in relation to a bank, &c. The gentleman had spoken of another change of principle, alluding to gentlemen from this side of the House, who voted for the present bill. In reply to this remark, Mr. G. said, in the first place, he had something of that old puritanical principle in him, which objected to being drilled in to vote in this or that manner, on whatever any gentleman chose to call a question of principle. Why did the gentleman call the power of appointment of five directors given to the Government, a question of principle? The question is, whether one-fifth of the direction gives the Government a control over the bank? I say no, said Mr. G.—the gentleman says yes, and saying so, this must be a question of principle. That, Mr. G. said, appeared to be the course of the gentleman's argument—the force of which he denied. He showed, that in the State banks in New York, (not undertaking to say how it might be in New Hampshire,) such features had been incorporated, even whilst General Hamilton was in the full vigor of his life and influence, and it was done by his party too, &c. The gentleman has said this control would be a lever in the hands of the Government. It was a straw, Mr. G. said, instead of a lever, and could not move an eagle, much less five-and-thirty millions of dollars. When, even on this side of the House, did this feature become a question of principle? Mr. G. went on to show, that he had objected to the feature in question, and endeavored to procure it to be expunged; but he never considered it, nor had it been debated, but as a question of detail. All legislation, he proceeded to argue, was founded in the idea of mutual compromise as to modifications of details; and this clause, now so much objected to, could produce no possible injury to the people or to the Government. When and where did this clause grow into a principle? He could tell, he said, the way it travelled, and where it became a principle—not in the open face of day—he would not, however, here relate its history. It had not been a principle with him, and never should be. Mr. G. went on to say, that he had never heard a wish expressed from any side of the House, that the Government should have an absolute control over the operations of the bank, &c. When the discussion on this bill had been first opened, Mr. G. said, he had heard an able and eloquent speech of the gentleman from New Hampshire, on the subject; and that very speech, in which the evils of the present system were fully depicted, had convinced him of the expediency of the establishment of this bank, as better calculated than anything else to remedy the evil. The gentleman had concluded that address with saying, that if Congress rose without providing a proper remedy, they would deserve the execration of the nation. Mr. G. said he believed it; and believing, as he had fully delivered his opinion the other day, that there was no remedy but the bill on the table, he should certainly vote for it. Mr. G. made other remarks to show the correctness of this conclusion, and ending by saying that in the course he was obliged to take, nothing grieved him so much as the necessity of differing on an important question from men whom he had been in the habit of respecting as oracles, and with whom it was generally his pride and pleasure to act.

Mr. WEBSTER, in replying to Mr. GROSVENOR, disclaimed any intention to dictate, &c. In regard to the feature of the bill which was the subject of discussion, Mr. W. said, he considered it a matter of principle, but attributed that opinion to the gentleman from New York no further than he had assumed the charge of a departure from principle to apply to himself. What is the matter of principle in this case? That control and influence over a great banking institution should not be possessed by the Government. The degree of that influence was not material—the principle remaining the same, be the influence more or less extensive. That principle was violated by this bill, which, he went on to say, could not be fairly compared with similar features in small banks in the State Governments. But, he added, every bank so constructed in the United States had failed to answer the purposes for which it was instituted, and was at this moment in the daily habitual violation of its engagements. Could it be doubted, Mr. W. said, that with this capital, and this power over it, the Government could bring any man into terms, and make the banks act as they pleased? Gentlemen had done him honor in quoting his opinions in support of part of the bill; but he asked, if it was fair to quote a part of his opinions as authority, and abuse him for the rest? Mr. W. expressed the pleasure he had enjoyed in travelling with his friends here. If, in journeying with a friend, on a road pleasant and smooth, through verdant fields, they should arrive at a part rough and disagreeable; if they should encounter gloom, and darkness should overtake him; if then his friend chose to abandon him, and seek a road more agreeable, let him not, said he, complain, if I continue on the old one. To complain of him, Mr. W. said, the gentleman might as well complain of the fifty-nine others with whom he acted. The gentleman reminded him of the anecdote of the eleven obstinate jurors, and related a case, in which one juror informed the judge that there would be no difficulty in making up a verdict, if it were not for the other eleven, who were the most obstinate fellows he ever met with, and that he himself was the only candid and liberal man of the whole twelve. Mr. W. said he had shaken hands with the gentleman last session on this subject; if they had changed their opinions, they had not made the world the wiser for them. Mr. W. said, though young, he found that he possessed antiquated notions; and that, to be useful, he ought to have been with generations that had gone by.

Mr. HULBERT said, until the gentleman could show himself divested of the frailties of human nature, he ought not to complain that a part only of his opinions were quoted. Mr. H. reminded the gentleman of an authority with which he doubtless was well acquainted; the learned Coke, having finished his great and elaborate commentary on law—a work which would be the admiration of all ages—concludes it by advising his readers not to believe that all which he finds in that book to be law, for there was much of it that was not law. Mr. H. said, if he had had any doubts on this bill, his friend from New York

(Mr. GROSVENOR) had made a speech which perfectly satisfied him of the excellence of the bank. The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. WEBSTER) had at first made the amount of capital an all-important, a fatal error; soon afterwards he came into the House, and declared that the government of the bank was a sine qua non, and for that would compromise his other objections. [Mr WEBSTER here denied that he had said so.] I do not, said Mr. H., pretend to repeat the gentleman's words, but I appeal to this honorable House, if the gentleman did not say that the government of the bank was a sine qua non with him, and, if that was given up, he would support the bill. I do not censure that declaration, said Mr. H.; the great charter under which we sit here, is the work of compromise; the South suffered itself to be taxed by the North, for its slave population; the spirit of compromise and concession pervades the whole instrument. What the gentleman meant by green fields, smooth roads, separation, &c., Mr. H. said he could not tell; but if he meant to attribute to him any improper influence, he disdained the insinuation; while he lived he would act on solid and independent principles. He came here first in a time of war, and, being a young member, expected to find the party to which he was proud to belong, as the saying is, sticking together; but he was surprised to find that gentleman often voting on this side and the other. Mr. H. said he would not part with friends, unless they thrust him off; but he would prefer parting with friends to parting with his conscience.

Mr. McKEE spoke in support of the bill; and asked the gentleman from New Hampshire, notwithstanding he would to-morrow oppose the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, or any other unconstitutional measure, yet, if a case might not arise in which its suspension would be proper, and he consent to it? Mr. McK. argued, that there now existed a similar necessity for this bank. The Constitution had made it the duty of Congress to regulate the national currency, and remedy evils therein; and the proper inquiry now was, whether this bank was a proper measure to carry the Constitutional power into effect in this emergency? For this inquiry there was the most rational ground. No Treasury regulation would remedy the evil; the banks would laugh at any such regulation. Mr. McK. said he had voted for the old bank; that he had survived the storm in which his vote had involved him; experience had justified his conduct; and he hoped still to survive, should another storm succeed his present course.

Mr. SHEFFEY said, he was not scrupulous as to the power of the Government to establish this bank; but he did not admit that what was unconstitutional to-day would not be so to-morrow; that instrument was fixed and eternal, and could not be got over. The suspension of the writ of habeas corpus was dependent on a fact, which, if it occurred, the suspension would be proper; but, if not, it was unauthorized. Mr. S. said he had voted for renewing the old bank, because he thought it was necessary; and if he could be convinced that this bank would realize the expectation of its friends, he would give up his objections. But, without any disparagement to his friends, and notwithstanding the great talents of the gentleman (Mr. CALHOUN) who led the business, Mr. S. said the question had not been properly met and discussed. When they came to show how the promised remedy was to be produced, they dealt in generals; they did not demonstrate their assertions; it was here they failed, and would fail. Mr. S. then argued at some length, to show that the bank would not answer the purpose of correcting the evils in the currency, and that the expectation was visionary and delusive.

The question was then taken, and decided against postponement—yeas 67, nays 91, as follows:

seph S. Newell; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Ordered, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be discharged from a further consideration of the bill from the Senate, supplementary to the act to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia, and that it be referred to Mr. HERBERT, Mr. CALDWELL, Mr. LEWIS, Mr. ORMSBY, and Mr. PIPER.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the benefit of the widow and children of Robert Fulton, deceased;" also, a bill "to establish a system of navigation for the United States," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. CALHOUN from the Committee on a National Currency, reported a bill for the more effectual collection of revenue in the lawful money of the United States, which was twice read and committed. The bill is as follows:

A bill for the more effectual collection of the public revenue, in the lawful money of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, as soon as conveniently may be after the passing of this act, to give public notice, in any one or more of the papers published in each and every State or Territory of the United States, that, from and after the thirty-first day of December next, the payment of duties, taxes, debts, and generally of all sums of money whatsoever, which have then accrued and become payable, or which shall thereafter accrue and become payable to the United States, or to any public officer, agent or other person, for their use, will be demanded in the gold, silver and copper coins of the United States, or in such foreign coins as have been or shall be made current by law. And from and after the said thirty-first day of December next, it shall not be lawful for any public officer, agent or other person whomsoever, employed in the collection or receipt of the revenue, or other public money whatsoever, to accept or allow payment of any such duties, taxes, debts or sums of money whatsoever, in any other medium than in the said coins, or in Treasury notes: Provided, always, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to authorize and permit, as heretofore, the notes of any bank or bankers which are payable and paid on demand in the said coins, to be accepted and allowed in all payments to the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the said thirty-first day of December next, the Secretary of the Treasury shall not authorize or permit any public money to be deposited, or to continue to be deposited with any bank or bankers, whose notes are not payable and paid on demand in the said coins of the United States, or in foreign coins made current by law as aforesaid. And from and after the said thirty-first day of December, all public moneys shall be deposited in such secure place, in the States and Territories respectively, as the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, shall designate and appoint.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the said thirty-first day of December next, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause legal measures to be taken for enforcing a lawful payment of all sums of money due to the United States, on account of bank notes or deposits, from any bank or bankers, whose notes are not then payable and paid on demand in the said coins of the United States, or in foreign coins made current by law as aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the said thirty-first day December next, upon any promissory notes, or notes payable either to bearer or to order, issued by any of the banks or corporations who issue and discount notes, bonds or obligations, either incorporated or not incorporated, which now are or hereafter shall be established in the United States or Territories thereof, there shall be levied, collected and paid the several stamp duties following—

If not exceeding one dollar, ten cents.

If above one dollar, and not exceeding two dollars, twenty cents.

If above two dollars and not exceeding three dollars, thirty cents.

If above three dollars and not exceeding five dollars, fifty cents.

If above five dollars and not exceeding ten dollars, one dollar.

If above ten dollars and not exceeding twenty dollars, two dollars.

If above twenty dollars and not exceeding fifty dollars, five dollars.

If above fifty dollars and not exceeding one hundred dollars, ten dollars.

If above one hundred dollars and not exceeding five hundred dollars, fifty dollars.

If above five hundred dollars, one hundred dollars.

And in relation to the stamp duties herein and hereby imposed, there shall not be allowed any annual or other composition or commutation, but the same shall be specifically collected for and upon the stamps affixed to the notes hereby charged therewith, saving the rights of all persons under existing contracts. And it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the Revenue to cause to be provided so many marks and stamps, differing from each other, as shall correspond with the several rates of duty aforesaid; but each stamp shall express, among other things, the following words at length, in distinct and legible characters: "Not a specie note." And all the provisions of the act entitled, "An act for laying duties on notes of banks," &c., passed on the second of August, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, and of the supplements thereto, passed on the tenth of December, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, shall be applied to the stamp duties imposed by this act, as fully as if the same were herein recited and re-enacted, except so far as respects the rates of duty and an annual composition in lieu of the stamp duties. Provided always, nevertheless, That if any banks or bankers shall, on or before the first day of November next, certify to the Secretary of the Treasury that their notes will be payable and paid in coin as aforesaid, upon demand, after the thirty-first day of December next, and if it appear to his satisfaction that payment is to be made, then, with respect to such banks and bankers, the rate of duty and the privilege of composition and commutation shall remain in all respects as if this act had not been passed.

THE TARIFF.

The House proceeded to consider the bill regulating the duties on imports and tonnage: when The amendment proposed by Mr. Ross, and depending on the 4th instant, was modified by the mover, and agreed to by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. ROBERTSON to recommit the bill to a Committee of the whole House.—Negatived.

A motion was made by Mr. HUGER further to amend the bill by inserting, at the end of the 34th line of the 1st section of the printed bill, the following proviso:

"Provided, That woollen cloths, or cloths of which wool is the material of chief value, the original cost of which at the place whence exported shall not exceed three shillings sterling per square yard, shall be charged with no higher duty than twelve and a half per centum ad valorem; but such cloths, to be entitled to the advantage of this provision, shall be imported in separate and distinct packages, which shall contain no cloth, the prime cost of which, at the place whence exported, shall exceed three shillings sterling per square yard."

And the question being taken on agreeing to the said proviso, it was determined in the negative—yeas 51, nays 85, as follows:

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting a copy of a report of the commissioners for settling claims to land in the Western district of the State of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to report to the House of Representatives of the United States, at the next session of Congress, whether any, and if any, what alterations or modifications are necessary to be made in the laws establishing ports of entry and delivery; and what new regulations, if any, are required for the government of the same; and also whether ports of entry are not multiplied beyond the number which policy prescribes for the safe collection of the revenue.

Ordered, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be discharged from a further consideration of the several petitions and resolutions referred to them during the present session respecting the establishment of ports of entry and delivery, and that they be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill from the Senate "for the benefit of the widow and children of Robert Fulton, deceased," was read twice, and committed to Mr. GROSVENOR, Mr. TUCKER, Mr. SERGEANT, Mr. SHARPE, Mr. CREIGHTON, Mr. CONNER, and Mr. CALHOUN.

The bill from the Senate "to establish a system of navigation for the United States," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole, to whom is committed the bill for the more convenient arrangement of the times and places of holding the circuit courts of the United States for the districts of South Carolina and Georgia, be discharged from a further consideration of the same, and that the bill be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

THE TARIFF.

The engrossed bill to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage, was read the third time; and the question stated, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the bill be postponed to December next. In making this motion, Mr. R. said, he was not actuated by the usual motives of similar motions. It proceeded from a belief that the subject had not been properly and maturely prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury. He wished the subject postponed to the next session, that the system might be printed collaterally with the present duties, that every member might take it home and consult his constituents—those whose opinions he ought to respect. The bill, Mr. R. said, had been precipitated through the House, and the discussion on it showed a strange and mysterious connexion between this measure and one (the bank bill) which had just passed, and was now beyond the control of this House. Another reason for referring the subject to the next session was, he said, the material injury it would produce on the revenue if adopted now; and at this time the Secretary of the Treasury ought strictly to guard against any deficit in the revenue. He thought the reasons for postponement were imperious.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed the motion for postponement. Among other arguments, in reply to Mr. RANDOLPH, he said it was extremely necessary to adopt at once some permanent system on which commercial men, as well as others, might rely with confidence. If the tariff were not passed, the commercial community would have to look to the next session, without knowing how to shape their conduct, or form their calculations, uncertain of the policy which might be then adopted.

H. OF R.

The Tariff.

APRIL, 1816.

Mr. LOWNDES also offered some remarks in reply to Mr. RANDOLPH, and against postponing the bill. He denied the charge of precipitation in the Secretary of the Treasury in making his report; and referred to the circular letters long since sent to various quarters in search of information, to show that the Secretary had not acted prematurely, and that measures were long ago taken to obtain all possible light on the subject. Mr. L. admitted that there were particular features in the bill about the passage of which he was not anxious; but in a system so extensive there must be particular parts on which members could not agree. As a whole, however, he had no doubt it would be beneficial to the revenue, &c., and to the general interests of the country.

Mr. CALHOUN had no intention of entering in a discussion of the motion; but he wished merely to reply to the insinuation of a mysterious connexion between this bill, and that to establish the bank. He denied any improper or unfair understanding, and could challenge the House to support the charge. In fact, Mr. C. said, the most zealous friends of the bank were generally unfriendly to this tariff; and the warmest friends of either could not be found on the same side.

After some further conversation between Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. CALHOUN, the question was taken by yeas and nays, on the postponement, and decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 95, as follows:

Mr. WRIGHT also spoke some time against the bill; as also did

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the House then took up the resolution fixing the period of adjournment.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the gradual increase of the Navy.

Mr. PLEASANTS (chairman of the Naval Committee) entered into a detailed statement of the considerations on which the committee had formed the bill, and their reasons for deviating from a precise adherence to the Secretary's recommendations. It was within the recollection of the Committee, that, in a report made to the Senate in the earlier part of the session of Congress, the Secretary of the Navy recommended an annual addition to the present Navy of one ship of seventy-four guns, two of forty-four, and two sloop-of-war of the heaviest class. The committee, Mr. P. said, had bestowed much consideration on the subject, and after obtaining all the information they could from the sources calculated, in their judgments, to furnish the best, they had determined to recommend to the House the provisions contained in the present bill. There would have been some difficulty in framing a law in such a way as to have provided for a certain annual addition to the Navy. The timbers and other necessary materials could not have been procured in such a way as to insure a punctual compliance with the law. The committee, therefore, determined to recommend an annual appropriation of one million of dollars for eight years; this would make an addition to our present naval force of nine seventy-four-gun ships, twelve of forty-four guns, and three steam batteries; two of the latter to be applied to the defence of the waters of the Chesapeake, and one to the defence of New Orleans. The Secretary's plan of adding one seventy-four, two forty-fours, and two sloops, annually, would have required an appropriation for that term of upwards of a million of dollars. Mr. P. observed that it was the opinion of the best informed of our naval officers that our funds had better be applied towards procuring heavy ships immediately; that sloop-of-war, though of great use in time of war, might easily be procured in a very short time by the Government, either by having them built at our own yards or by contract. Indeed, it was the opinion of one, at least, very intelligent officer, that sloop-of-war ought not to form a permanent part of our Navy at all; but when it was found necessary to use them in time of war, they should be sold on the return of peace. According to an estimate made in the beginning of the session to the Senate by the Secretary of the Navy, and which is on the files of this House, it will be seen, that to build and equip a seventy-four-gun ship, it will cost $384,862; this sum, multiplied by nine—the number of seventy-fours proposed to be built in eight years—will make $3,463,758. The building and equipping a forty-four-gun frigate will cost $268,400, which sum, multiplied by twelve, the number of frigates proposed to be built in eight years, will make the sum $3,220,800. The three steam-batteries they had allowed to take one million of dollars more. Thus the whole sum estimated by the committee for building the proposed ships-of-the-line, heavy frigates and steam-batteries, is $7,634,558. The committee took some pains to ascertain, as far as such a thing could be ascertained with anything like certainty, the capacity of the United States to man a fleet of such a description as the proposed addition will give us. From information received from the most intelligent sources, they have no doubt that such a fleet may be easily manned. The present number of seamen belonging to the United States is not ascertained with precision; it is probably little or nothing short of seventy, perhaps eighty thousand. One fourth of this number may be calculated on for public service. The number of prime seamen allowed to a seventy-four is two hundred; ordinary seamen and boys, three hundred; twelve seventy-fours, then, will require two thousand four hundred prime, and three thousand six hundred ordinary seamen and boys—six thousand in the whole—and so in proportion for frigates, sloop-of-war, &c. It was well known also, that of the ordinary seamen and boys, landsmen may make up a part; men who can be taught to handle the guns. The whole expense of keeping a seventy-four in service for one year is estimated at $189,740; of a forty-four, $134,210. The estimates here referred to, said Mr. P., are taken from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, before referred to; made out in detailed and minute statements, by the assistance of the Commissioners of the Navy, and may, it is believed, be confidently relied on. It was a remarkable fact, that, from the commencement of our Revolutionary war, this nation had never been engaged in war, but a Navy had been popular. The Revolutionary Congress, at a very early period of the war, authorized the building, equipping, and commissioning of thirteen ships-of-war

five of them frigates. This, for their limited means, was a great deal. Mr. Jefferson, in his Notes on Virginia, written during the war, Mr. P. believed, though not published till some time after, with full experience of the immense disadvantages to which we were subjected in a contest with a nation possessing a maritime superiority, gives it as his opinion, that Virginia ought to bend her exertions towards equipping a naval force. The amount of that force is not now particularly recollected, the passage in the Notes not having been lately read; but it was believed that the amount recommended by him would have cost the State of Virginia as much at that time as her proportion of the proposed increase would now. But if any evidence were wanting to convince this nation of the great importance of a Navy as a part of her national defensive means, that evidence has been amply furnished by the events of the late war; events, thanks to the gallantry of those who achieved them, which have made an impression on the public mind so deep that he hoped they would never be erased. Sir, you have your seventy or eighty thousand seamen; unless you have heavy ships, this force, consisting of some of the most gallant men in the world, is lost to the public defence. They are not on your militia rolls; they will not enlist in your armies; they may be engaged in a predatory warfare as privateersmen; but, I say again, as a part of your defensive force, without heavy ships, they are lost to your service. Sir, a great deal might be said on this subject. Mr. P. said he had made notes to say much more, but from the advanced period of the session, not to mention the late hour of the day, and believing the public mind to be made up on this subject, he could not consent to tax the patience of the House by progressing in his remarks; but would with pleasure give any information he might possess to any gentleman who required it, or answer as far as he could any objection which should be made to the details of the bill.

Mr. CLAY proposed that the bill be so amended as to vest in the President a discretionary power to cause the steam-batteries to be built as soon as he should deem them necessary, without waiting any particular emergency. He referred to some correspondence between the Governor of Louisiana, the General Government, and the State of Kentucky, to show the great anxiety felt on the subject of creating at once a proper defence for the important city of New Orleans. The erection of the batteries could not be executed at that point, in case of any threatening circumstance, with as much promptitude as in the Chesapeake, which was in the vicinity of all the great resources of the country; and it was imprudent, therefore, to delay the building until an emergency should demand them.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MIDDLETON moved to increase the number of steam-batteries from three to four, with the view of placing one of them at Charleston, South Carolina.

Mr. CLAYSANTS had no objection to the amendment. The Commissioners of the Navy believed those batteries could be erected at much less expense than the one built at New York; and it was probable, he thought, that the appropriation would defray the cost of four.

Mr. FORSYTH doubted the propriety of adopting this amendment, with the very little experience which had been acquired on the subject. A steam frigate could guard but one point; and if one was voted to Charleston every town on the seaboard might ask the same; and he was unwilling to increase the number before their utility was better established.

Mr. MIDDLETON added some remarks to show the necessity of one of the steam batteries at Charleston; it being a kind of defence particularly adapted to the waters of that city, and much preferable to land batteries.

Mr. WEBSTER wished, instead of fixing the station of the steam frigates by law, that the bill was so amended as to allow them to be moved from one place to another, as the service might require. He presumed they might be so made as to make their removal on the coast practicable, and hoped the bill would be modified as he suggested.

Mr. LOWNDES said he had no further interest in the motion than any other gentleman in the House; but hoped the amendment would prevail, because he had no doubt, in addition to giving defence to the city of Charleston, it would tend to economise the public money. The waters of Charleston, he said, were peculiarly favorable for a defence of this kind, and would there supersede the necessity of additional defences, which were almost ineffectual as an outpost against a strong naval force, as every one knew with how little hazard a ship of war may at certain favorable moments pass a stationary fort. A steam battery would save the public money, because some of the works were in ruins, the repairing of which would be a great expense. Mr. L. had no doubt that the protection of Charleston as well as of other cities would receive all reasonable attention from Government; but the alternative between repairing works requiring six or seven hundred men to defend them and a less expensive yet more effectual defence, the latter ought to be adopted. He agreed, however, with Mr. WEBSTER, that the Secretary of the Navy ought to be free to apply the public naval force to any point deemed by him most proper.

Mr. FORSYTH repeated, that if the report of the committee were departed from, by adding a steam frigate for Charleston, any other maritime towns might demand the same. He was against adopting to a greater extent at present the steam battery system, in which we had no experience; and was averse to abandoning the old system in which the experience was ample. He understood that the steam frigate at New York cost nearly as much as a seventy-four, and he would prefer a seventy-four, until he was convinced of the superiority of the other engine. Mr. F. said the arguments of the gentlemen who advocated floating instead of land defences, went to support his opinions, as he preferred the naval defence, but of that kind whose utility and management we were well acquainted with.

Mr. MIDDLETON's motion to insert four instead of three steam frigates, was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved to amend the bill by striking out the words directing two of the batteries to be stationed in the Chesapeake and the other at New Orleans, so as to leave their application to the direction of the President.

Mr. ROBERTSON could not consent to the amendment. The great distance of New Orleans from the Seat of Government and from other parts of the United States, required a constant defence there; it ought not to be left to an uncertain protection. From the Chesapeake and other parts they could make known their wants immediately, and obtain, in case of emergency, prompt aid from the Government, backed also by a numerous representation here. A steam frigate might possibly move from New York to Philadelphia, but he believed it impracticable to navigate the coast with them to New Orleans; a voyage to which, from any of the other cities, was as difficult and dangerous as one across the Atlantic. It was therefore necessary to have one built and stationed there. The President might not deem a frigate so necessary for the Mississippi as he (Mr. R.) did, and he wished to legislate on it to put his object beyond accident or anything else. The Legislature of Louisiana had considered it so important that they had instructed their representatives in Congress to use their best exertions to obtain one for the waters of that State. He repeated that a place so important, so weak and so distant, ought to have a certain and assured protection. However much may have been stated in theory that steam vessels could navigate the ocean, still it remained untried and questionable. He wanted no confidence in the Executive; but the best way, he said, to get business done is to do it ourselves; and he wished, therefore, to secure the defence of New Orleans by a legislative provision.

Mr. CLAY felt the same desire for the defence of New Orleans as his friend from Louisiana; but he must surely be struck, said Mr. C., with the impropriety of directing one steam frigate to be stationed at this place and one at another, &c. We may confidently rely, he said, on the President of the United States for the prudent application of the public force; a contrary course would imply a suspicion of an improper employment of the force by the Executive, which he was certain the Naval Committee did not mean.

Mr. PICKERING had no objection to the amendment. The President of the United States, having here near him a board of experienced naval officers, would be always ready to act on the business with the best advice. He agreed with Mr. FORSYTH, that instead of additional steam batteries, we had better have more seventy-fours, which can move with facility from one point to another. Steam frigates might be peculiarly proper for Charleston and New Orleans, and he was willing to have two for those places, but more he could not approve.

Mr. PLEASANTS said, that the Naval Committee had taken advice of those best qualified to afford it, and they had sanctioned the course reported in the bill. He thought there was no impropriety in expressing by law where certain engines of defence should be employed. They were floating batteries, and it was no less proper to say they should be placed at particular points, than to direct by law the erection of a land battery at this or that place. Mr. P. adverted to the course pursued by the late enemy, whose first attempts were in the Chesapeake, which he took possession of, and of course of all its extensive waters. Mr. P. also referred to the wide scope which the Chesapeake afforded to the operations of an enemy; the immense trouble and expense required to defend its shores and those of its tributary waters; and to enforce the necessity of providing for it now a particular and adequate defence, by which the expense might be avoided of calling out a double force at so many points to repel an enemy when he came. Though he should vote against the amendment, Mr. P. said he felt every confidence in the Executive, and should acquiesce in the amendment with pleasure, if the House accepted it.

Mr. WEBSTER said if the President of the United States be the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval force, it was certainly improper to take out of his hands the direction of it. He considered the steam frigates strictly a part of that force, and there was an impropriety in not leaving it to his control. The law authorizing the one built at New York did not fix it there permanently; and to do so in this case he thought unnecessary as well as improper, believing that those frigates could, as had been asserted by experienced persons, be moved from one place to another, as the exigency might demand.

Mr. WEBSTER's motion was then agreed to by a large majority, and the bill, as amended, ordered to a third reading nem. con.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to enable the people of the Indiana Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," were read and concurred in by the House.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the joint committee appointed to examine the business depending before the two Houses, to ascertain what portion required to be acted on at the present session, and when it will be expedient to close the same; whereupon the House came to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate, and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close this session, by the adjournment of their respective Houses on Saturday, the 20th day of April, instant.

An engrossed resolution, entitled "A resolution to indemnify Jabez Mowry and others," was read the third time, and passed.

COMPENSATION OF COLLECTORS.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the joint resolution for the relief of James H. McCulloch, Collector of the port of Baltimore, allowing an extra compensation to him and other collectors, whose emoluments were materially reduced by the operation of the restrictive system. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, &c. That the President of the United States be authorized to allow an extra compensation for a limited time to those officers of the customs whose emoluments were diminished below a reasonable salary during the restrictive system.

The resolution gave rise to a short debate, peculiarly interesting, from the brief but eloquent narrative given by Mr. PINKNEY of the gallantry of Mr. McCulloch, who, though nearly eighty years of age, and exempted by years and by office from the toils of military service, yet shouldered his musket when the British approached Baltimore in 1814, entered the ranks as a private soldier, and was the foremost to meet the enemy at North Point, where he received a wound which renders him a cripple for life.

The resolution was also supported by Mr. SMITH, and Mr. WRIGHT; and opposed by Mr. SHEFFEY and Mr. GROSVENOR, not from any want of regard for the character and conduct of the petitioner; but on the ground of the inexpediency of making good the reduced emoluments of the collectors, who took their office with a foreknowledge of its precarious profits, and because it was in that character alone Mr. McCulloch appeared before the House for relief.

The resolution was reported to the House without amendment, and laid on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill to authorize the survey of two millions of acres of the public lands, in lieu of that quantity heretofore authorized to be surveyed, in the Territory of Michigan, as military bounty lands; and after some time spent therein, the bill was reported without amendment. The bill was then amended at the Clerk's table, and the House adjourned.

Ordered, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from a further consideration of the resolution of the 7th of February last, relative to the trade between the United States and the British West India islands.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Judge Tallmadge, made a report; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

On motion of Mr. EASTON, the Secretary of the Treasury was requested to procure all the information he may be enabled to obtain, in relation to the lead mines of the United States, in the counties of Washington and St. Genevieve, in the Missouri Territory, and report the same, at the next session of Congress, to this House.

The Message received yesterday from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, communicating copies of a Convention concluded between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, on the second day of March last, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Engrossed bills of the following titles to wit:

An act making appropriations for rebuilding light-houses, and for completing the plan of lighting them, according to the improvement of Winslow Lewis; for placing beacons and buoys; for the preservation of Little Gull Island; and for surveying the coast of the United States;

An act to authorize the building of three light-houses, viz: one on Race Point, one on Point Gammon, and one on the island of Petite Manon, in the State of Massachusetts;

An act for the relief of Richard Mitchell; were severally read the third time, and passed.

The bill, under discussion yesterday, when the House adjourned, to authorize the survey of two millions of acres of public land in lieu of that quantity ordered to be surveyed in Michigan Territory, was, on motion, laid on the table.

The bills concerning field officers of the militia, and the bill for the relief of David Coffin, David and William Rodman, and Samuel Rodman, jr.; passed through Committees of the whole House, and were ordered to a third reading.

The bill authorizing the Potomac Company to acquire certain lands by purchase, and dispose of water rights, was indefinitely postponed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to allow the crew of the privateer Roger the legal bounty on thirty-seven prisoners captured in a British vessel, after the treaty was ratified, but within the time allowed for the continuance of hostilities in the latitude where the capture was made.

A motion, made by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, to make the provisions of the bill general, and embrace all similar captures, produced some debate, and was finally negatived.

The bill was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading.

Petition of John McCauley—Specie Payments.

H. OF R.

PETITION OF JOHN McCAULEY.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John McCauley, prize agent for the officers and crew of the brig Vixen, during the war with the Regency of Tripoli, with the report of the Secretary of the Navy, made a report thereon; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Navy on the petition of John McCauley, prize agent, report:

That they have considered the report of the Secretary of the Navy, together with the opinion of the Attorney General on the case of the Madonna Catapoliana, captured by the Syren for a breach of the blockade of the port of Tripoli in the war carried on by the United States against that Power. The Attorney General gives it as his opinion that the subject is a proper one for the consideration of Congress, as he does not think it different in principle from the case of the Algerine vessels taken in the late war against that Power, and restored at the Treaty of Peace, and for which the captors have been compensated by a bill which has passed this House. The Algerine vessels were taken in open war from an enemy; the Madonna Catapoliana was taken from a neutral and friendly Power for a breach of blockade, and restored without having ever been carried before a court of admiralty. The committee think it would be carrying the principle too far to say that a vessel, belonging to a friendly and neutral Power, captured for breach of blockade, and restored to the neutral by the commander of the blockading squadron, without the case having been decided on by a court of admiralty, [should oblige the Government] to pay to the captors the supposed value of such prize. They therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the said petition, and that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition and documents.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, March 29, 1816.

SIR: I have the honor, in obedience to an order of the House of Representatives of the 5th of February last, to transmit to you, to be laid before them, the petition of John McCauley, with the papers connected therewith, and a copy of the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, to whom I referred the points of law which the subject involved. Should Congress decide, in conformity with the opinion of the Attorney General, to grant the amount of the original valuation of the brig Transfer, a special appropriation will be necessary for that object. It will remain for Congress to judge of the principle and policy which led to the restoration of the ship Madonna Catapoliana without a judicial appeal, and how far the case is analogous to the late transactions with Algiers.

All which is respectfully submitted.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant, B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

The honorable the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

WASHINGTON, March 27, 1816.

SIR: I have examined the papers transmitted to me with your letter of the 12th of last month, and have now the honor to submit, according to your request, the following opinions upon the cases which they present:

1st. It appears that the brig Transfer was captured off Tripoli for a breach of blockade on the 17th of March, 1804, by a part of the squadron under the command of Commodore Preble; that she was regularly condemned as a prize of war; and that she was taken by the Commodore at a valuation of $5,000, and placed in the service of the United States, where she co-operated as a cruiser with the squadron aforesaid in the course of its subsequent belligerent operations. Under such a state of facts, I do not think that the captors are divested of their prize interest. They are entitled to it at the hands of the Government, which thus became the purchaser of the prize. Considering this interest as a vested one on their part, I can see no objection to a payment of the amount by the Navy Department, provided there be any existing appropriation of money to cover such payment. I also think that the portion of the prize to which the United States are entitled should, as in other cases, be applied to the use of the navy pension fund, as directed by the ninth section of the act of Congress of the 23d April, 1800.

2d. In regard to the ship Madonna Catapoliana, captured by a part of the same squadron off Tripoli, on the 22d March, 1804, and restored to the former owners by the authority of the Commodore, before any condemnation or judicial proceedings had, it would seem alike equitable that the captors should be reimbursed. I forbear, at this time, the expression of any more direct opinion upon this case, the power of Congress being fully competent to act upon it, as in the case now before that body of the Algerine vessels lately surrendered, from which the present is not, in principle, distinguishable.

I pray you, sir, to receive as an apology for this late answer to your letter, that, when it was received, and for some weeks afterwards, my constant public engagements at the Supreme Court of the United States prevented an attention to other subjects.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, &c., RICHARD RUSH.

Hon. B. W. CROWNINSHIELD,
Secretary of the Navy.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill providing for the collection of debts due to the Government in the lawful money of the country—in other words, to compel the banks to resume the payment of specie.

Mr. CALHOUN took a succinct view of the bill, and recapitulated briefly the evils which demanded this measure.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he felt great difficulty on this subject; but, to make the measure as unexceptionable as possible, he moved to insert the 1st of March next, instead of the 31st of December, as the day on which the act should commence its operation. In the present situation of the currency of the country, he observed, no specie being paid anywhere, except in the New England States, if indeed there, the measure may be attended with great inconvenience to the Treasury, and also to the interior of the country, if the banks are compelled in a short time to pay in coin. In considering the present state of the banks, it may be doubted whether it can be done. In the large cities it would be attended with great difficulty, and with stagnation of business, because no man will make engagements on credit; every one will be cautious in making contracts to pay at a future day. The banks must, in a great degree, stop their discounts; their stoppage will paralyze those around them; to what extent he could not say, but that it would be great, Mr. S. argued, from the result of the late attempt in Virginia, where the banks, by similar coercion, lessened their discounts greatly, in consequence of which flour had fallen to five dollars a barrel. Will you, he asked, be able to collect your taxes there? He apprehended not. Mr. S. said, he had never been able, with all his practice and experience, to understand the subject of money fully. He had a hope, however, that, if extended to March, with the aid of the Bank of the United States, this measure might succeed. The bank would contain a great part of the hoarded treasure of the country; after the three first instalments were got in, with importations from abroad, the bank would be able to pay specie. They will postpone going into operation until they are thus prepared; and that would not be until the 1st of January. This made it necessary, he thought, for the time in this bill to be extended to March, which would soften the measure and make it less dangerous. But what would be done in the interior, Mr. S. said, he did not know. The Secretary of the Treasury would, doubtless, make the change as easy as possible by Treasury regulations; but as the present officer, it was understood, would not continue, he could not tell what would be the effect; he feared much from the measure. He hoped it would likewise be aided somewhat by the tariff, which would lessen the extent of the India trade, which, of course, would not consume so much of the specie of the country. Mr. S. cited some fiscal transactions in Baltimore to support his opinion, that the Secretary of the Treasury would do everything in his power to lessen the pressure, and enable the State banks to enter into the proposed measure without great pressure on the Treasury or on the country, but did not believe the bill would be beneficial or proper, unless the time was extended beyond the day proposed; and he hoped, therefore, his amendment would be adopted.

Mr. HOPKINSON said, make this measure as they would, still it must inevitably be very oppressive. But all had agreed it was wrong to let things go on in their present course, and that Congress should devise a remedy for them. In considering this question, the time, he said, was of much consequence. In any great change in the community, time was necessary to enable them to meet it. In the present it was not, in his opinion, necessary, to fix any precise period; but a better rule, he thought, might be adopted. Mr. H. presumed, the State banks should commence paying specie at the same time the United States Bank should begin; because, said he, if you compel the State banks to open their vaults and give out their coin, it will all be drawn from them, and they cannot continue to redeem their notes with specie. On the other hand, if the United States Bank commences before the State banks do, the same evil will result to it; because two banks cannot exist at the same time, one paying specie, and the other not. Mr. H. said, he could wish, therefore, that the State institutions should start fair with the Bank of the United States, and instead of fixing a time at all in the bill, which might prove too soon or too late, he hoped it would be modified so as to say, from and after the time at which the Bank of the United States should commence its operations. [This proposition being decided not to be at this time in order, no question was taken on it.]

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, was opposed to Mr. SMITH's motion, and to any extension of the period whatever; because it would be injurious to the United States, and unjust to particular parts of the Union. The Constitution, he said, required that the duties to Government should be levied in an uniform and impartial manner, and such a provision would make the Constitutional injunction null and void; for where would be the difference, Mr. W. inquired, between directly and expressly allowing a difference, in collecting the revenues, to some parts of the country, and passing a law which would indirectly create such a difference? In some sections of the country the State bank notes are as good as specie; in others they are greatly depreciated. Could it be right that one section of the United States should be bound to pay in gold or silver, or in paper superior to that in other parts? They had been told of the bad consequences which would ensue from adjourning without applying a remedy to the disordered state of our currency—the proposed measure, he thought, would put it out of their power to do anything. He could not understand the subject as other gentlemen did; he thought it would be better to let the State banks alone; if they choose to pay or not to pay specie, still let them alone, if they can get on—we, said Mr. W., have nothing to do with them at all; but it is due to ourselves to refuse their notes when they do not pay specie. There was no mystery in this business, any more than in transactions with individuals. If they do not pay specie let their notes go out of circulation, or let the United States refuse to take them. It had been said, the Government could not get on, could not collect its duties in particular parts of the country, without the aid of this measure;—this opinion he thought erroneous—the Government would find no difficulty in the case. Suppose there was not a dollar of specie or coin in the United States, could not the Government still get on in its negotiations with the community without resorting to any measure like this? It had been stated in the course of the session, that the premiums received for difference between Treasury notes and depreciated notes amounted to $30,000—could it be right, he asked, for individuals to be defrauded in this way? Suppose the Government were to say, that Treasury notes should be received for taxes, &c.—the people every where owed Government, and the citizens would very cheerfully take them. Why could not the Government issue Treasury notes, then, and direct that no other paper should be received in the public dues? They would soon circulate everywhere, and be had without difficulty. He thought the operation would be easy and highly expedient, and it ought not to be delayed. If the depreciated bank notes would then answer the common purposes of marketing, &c., let them be used—when they cease to be useful they will go out of circulation. Mr. W. repeated, that it was partial and wrong to exact the taxes in one part of the country in gold or silver, or what was equal to specie, and receive in other parts a depreciated paper. The banks in Boston had never ceased to pay when demanded of them; and they had persevered in it, too, without any aid from the Government. He recapitulated a few arguments against the amendment, and concluded with the opinion, that it would be better to make the bill take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. TUCKER said, he rose to express his dissent to the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH.) As one of the committee which had reported the bill, he had conceived the first of January to be upon the whole the most proper period to commence the operation of the provisions contemplated by that committee. He hoped the House would coincide in their opinion; he hoped we should not now shrink from the adoption of measures which were intimately connected with and formed a part of that system of which the bank bill was a principal feature. The evils under which this nation was laboring had long been of serious and threatening magnitude. The currency of the country was in a state of disorder and embarrassment which had been too often strongly depicted, and was too generally and seriously felt to require any farther comment from him. In the strong language of the gentleman from South Carolina, the disease was deep-rooted, and it required the most rigorous remedies to produce a cure. Nothing but a sense of the absolute necessity of the strongest measures to restore soundness to the circulating medium, had induced the assent of Congress to the establishment of a National Bank. It was now to be seen whether we would follow up that important measure by others which were necessary to give it complete efficacy, and which had always been contemplated by its friends as intimately and essentially connected with its success. He hoped the Committee would not be unmindful of the change this bill had undergone since it was first reported to the House, and that it would be recollected that everything of a harsh and penal character had been erased from it. It had been recommitted on the motion of the chairman of the committee, with a view to an amendment, in which the select committee had concurred. They had stricken out the clause imposing an increased duty upon the notes of such banks as refused to redeem their notes in specie, not from any hesitation as to the ultimate propriety of adopting such provisions, but from a hope that measures less energetic might effect the great object they had in view. Should these fail, he believed there was a very general sentiment in the House favorable to the adoption at a future period of the vigorous means which at first had been reported by the committee. At present, however, the House was not called upon to decide upon that proposition. The measure now proposed, and to which their assent is asked, is one so palpably correct, so manifestly right and proper, that he had hoped it would have met with no opposition. What is proposed? Merely that the officers of the United States should not receive the duties and other sums payable to the Government in the depreciated paper of those banks which will not redeem their notes and fairly discharge their debts. Can such a measure be disapproved? Shall not the United States, who lay the taxes, have the privilege of prescribing the medium in which they shall be paid? Shall the nation alone be the sufferer by a tender law? Shall the humblest citizen in the community have a right to refuse to receive of his debtor the depreciated and worthless paper which is in circulation, and shall the nation be compelled to submit to such a payment? By no means. Justice to the nation, justice to the various parts of this Confederacy, justice to public creditors require that the revenues should be paid in a sound and undepreciated currency. The system at present existing, operates with peculiar hardship on some particular sections of the Union, and on some particular seaport towns. In the present state of things, the duties and taxes not only fall much more heavily upon those portions of the Union where the paper is least depreciated, but another consequence fatal to their interest is produced. Their seaport towns will be materially injured. The importing merchant in Norfolk, who can pay the duties on his cargo in Baltimore in paper worth twelve per cent. less than that of Norfolk, will find it to his interest to enter at Baltimore—pay the duties there and send his goods coastwise to Norfolk. He had heard from one of the most intelligent men in Virginia, lately from Norfolk, that things were already taking that course. The gentleman from Maryland could inform us whether it was really the case. For his own part he believed it, not only because of the source whence the information had been derived, but because it was the natural course of things. Twelve per cent. difference upon the amounts of duties on a large importation would, he presumed, justify the course of business to which he alluded. Its effect cannot be misconceived. It must tend to accumulate capital where the duties can be paid low, and to draw it from those ports where they were high. Thus by a strange injustice making, in effect, a distinction in favor of those who least deserve peculiar encouragement, whilst at the same time the amount and perhaps the security of the revenue may be considerably impaired. He, for one, was anxious to put an end to this state of things.

The Northern and the Southern States were equally liable to be sufferers from a situation of affairs calculated chiefly to benefit Baltimore, Philadelphia, and perhaps New York; and it was therefore necessary to adopt, as promptly as prudence would permit, a measure which would restore a just equality between the various sections of the Union. He would not dilate further on the general principles upon which he believed the proposed measure to be justified, but confine himself to the question raised by the motion of the gentleman from Maryland. That gentleman, on whose judgment the greatest reliance might be placed, had in the course of his remarks informed us that the Bank of the United States would most probably be in operation by the first of January. If so, and he had no doubt of the correctness of the opinion, upon what principles could the proposal to postpone the operation of the bill under consideration be justified? If, for two months after the United States Bank goes into operation, we permit the State banks to go on without paying specie—if we suffer them to continue the places of deposit of our revenue; if we give a credit to their depreciated paper by permitting it to be received in the collection of the revenue, shall we do justice to the bank we have lately chartered—shall we derive to the nation the benefit we anticipated from its establishment? Far from it. The inevitable effect will be, either to postpone the operations of the new bank till March, or, if it commences business, to expose it to the demands of the State banks, which collect its paper and draw out its specie, whilst on their part they will refuse to redeem their own notes with the same good faith. Moreover, the present inequality in the payment of duties will continue, as the duties in the Middle States will still be paid in their depreciated paper. And what good end was to be effected by the postponement? A little more time is asked. What use has been made of the past—what is likely to be made of the future, which cannot equally be effected by fixing on the first of January? The gentleman told the House very truly, that specie would be necessarily imported. Is there not time for these importations? If an effort was to be made to increase the quantity of coin in the country by importation, he believed that it would easily be effected by the Fall arrivals; and that no additional advantage would in this point of view accrue from extending the period during the Winter months of January and February. As, therefore, he was opposed to the continuation of the mischief from which we now suffer, and as he could see no necessity for the delay, he was decidedly opposed to it. He apprehended, seriously apprehended, that every day would add to the difficulty of effecting the desirable object of returning to a specie circulation. The banks now in existence—opposed from motives of self-interest to specie redemption—were almost too strong for the legislative arm. They formed a colossal power which it was difficult to resist. We already felt how arduous was the undertaking to control them, and to resist their influence. The longer we delay, the more seriously is that influence to be apprehended.

Mr. T. said, that he should consider it better to pass no law on the subject, than to extend the period mentioned in the bill. It would furnish an irresistible argument against the Secretary of the Treasury, should he after the first of January refuse to receive the paper of banks which do not redeem their notes. It would then be said, that Congress, by passing this bill (as proposed to be amended) had implicitly authorized the payment of the revenues in depreciated paper to the first of March. With such a construction in their favor, it is scarcely probable that the Secretary of the Treasury, who has been already compelled to yield to the force of circumstances in receiving their paper, will be able to withstand the torrent; and to insist, as he ought to do after the commencement of the operations of the Bank of the United States, on receiving the revenues in something better than a paper currency, which is not convertible into anything but paper.

Mr. T. said, he had no doubt that the State banks could prepare for the resumption of specie payments by the first of January. Though they have unquestionably overtraded, and probably cannot at this time redeem their paper, yet they have ample funds to effect the object if they would set seriously about it. The measure proposed will compel them to do so. If we let them alone they will never do it. They cannot do it without concert; there never will be that concert. If, instead of pressing their dealers, that their outcries may influence the measures of the Legislative body and prevent this necessary measure, they would curtail their discounts with moderation; if they would sell their stock, the price of which will be so much enhanced by the increased demand for it in payments of subscriptions to the National Bank;—if, after having for several years made immense dividends while the profits of every other class of society were reduced to nothing by the operation of the war, they would declare no dividend till they were enabled to pay their debts, he had no doubt they might in six months resume the payment of specie, without ruin or even material distress to the mass of society. It was a course which honesty and justice required—which the welfare of the nation demanded, and which we must enforce.

It had been intimated that there would be great difficulty in collecting the taxes for want of a medium. But the direct tax which will be payable before March next will be paid by January, so that the people of the interior will not be affected by this act, and as to those of the seaports, if they have the depreciated paper, they can always command what will pay their taxes, if they are willing to allow a fair discount. Upon the whole, Mr. T. had no doubt that it was necessary to give effect to this measure at as early a period as possible, and he was persuaded that the first of January would not be found too remote. He should therefore vote against the amendment.

Mr. SMITH having varied his motion from the first of March to the first of February—

Mr. INGHAM said, he would prefer the first of March to the first of February. It had been suggested that the State banks ought to be compelled to pay specie at the same time the National Bank commenced its operations; but it had not been shown at what time that bank could commence; he presumed neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor the Committee had calculated the National Bank to go into operation by the 31st of December. He perceived that the letter of the Secretary, by its date, was written before the Bank bill was passed; the time for opening the books had been protracted one month, and also the time for taking the subscriptions, making near two months longer than was contemplated at the time the letter was written. He presumed, therefore, that the first of March would be as early as the bank could be put into operation; and as this measure had been relied on to give facility to the State banks in resuming specie payments, this effect could not be produced if the State banks were compelled to pay specie before the United States Bank commenced its operation; but it would be better to protract the period somewhat beyond the time, than to attempt to coerce them before. The State banks had difficulties to encounter in resuming specie payments, which the United States Bank will not be exposed to; the former have contracted debts by issuing their notes in large quantities—the latter has no debts to pay; it will commence with caution; specie will circulate to a limited extent, and confidence will be gradually restored. The State banks having taken proper measures for that purpose, will feel the effect of this confidence, and the difficulty will be essentially diminished. The object of restoring the currency is a very desirable one, and whatever Congress do, they ought to do it with effect, avoiding all unnecessary pressure; but, taking a reasonable and practicable course, there will not be the same motive to relax the measure; and, having demanded nothing more than is reasonable, they will not be importuned for a suspension of the law at the next session, as was now the case in the State of Virginia, which had adopted a similar measure. If the time was protracted as proposed, Congress would be able to resist, with more fortitude and effect, the influence that would assail them, and the great object more effectually secured, than if the shortest period was adopted.

Mr. ROBERTSON said, it was true the State of Virginia had passed a law to compel specie payments; but the Legislature might be quickly called together, and he should not be surprised if, by the very influence of the banks, the clamor was, in that State, excited and kept up for the purpose of forcing a repeal of the law, and enabling them to continue their very profitable business. The clamor in Virginia for a call of the Legislature being, as he believed, factitious, and produced, indirectly, by the banks themselves, ought not to deter Congress from adopting proper measures to enforce the payment of specie. He believed this the last opportunity which would occur for years to act efficiently on the subject, and he trusted it would not be neglected.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped the motion to insert the first of February would not prevail. He added a few remarks to those he submitted when he first introduced the bill; and adverting to the effect of the Virginia enforcing act, observed, that an attempt to compel specie payments in a particular State, when all the surrounding banks did not so pay, was a very different thing from a general regulation, which would operate on every part of the country alike. He had all along believed no single State could safely resume the payment of specie—could not meet the consequent curtailment of discounts; but this did not prove that specie payments were impracticable, if resumed contemporaneously throughout the country. Mr. C. felt very anxious for the fate of this measure; he strongly suspected the banks did not mean voluntarily to resume specie payments, though it was in their power to import specie from abroad. He spoke boldly on the subject; he did not believe the banks sincere in their declarations, and if there was the least giving back here, the object would be lost. He hoped there would be such a vote on the bill, as would give assurance that Congress was determined to compel the restoration of a sound currency. To this end, Mr. C. believed, the last of December would afford the banks ample time; but he would not be tenacious on the subject, if the House thought otherwise.

Mr. GROSVENOR said, for himself, he would have preferred the bill in its original shape, to compel the payment of specie. He objected to the proposed amendment, not that a month or two was anything in the result, but that it was important, as it would affect ulterior measures of the Government. He hoped the time would be fixed as early in the next session as possible, that no difficulty might ensue from any pressure on Congress by the banking interest. Such pressure might be anticipated at the next session, and it might be too great to be resisted, if not now provided for.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, again rose in support of his motion. He wished eight weeks allowed for the United States Bank to commence its operations, that the pressure might be taken off the State banks; without this, merchants would not be able to pay their bonds at the custom-houses, and there would be a general shock to business throughout the community. Mr. S. declared that, if the 31st of December were retained, he should be obliged to vote against the bill. His anxiety to make the measure easy to the banks arose from no interested feeling—he owned not a cent's worth of bank stock. He believed the banks were making arrangements to meet the crisis, and that they would be able and willing to resume specie payments in a reasonable time. The banks of Baltimore had now less notes out than those of Boston; and he himself had purchased one hundred thousand silver dollars at five per cent. only. Mr. S. thought a little indulgence to the banks on this subject would produce much good, and that too much hardship would do great harm. He was averse to any attempt to force the banks to do what it was impracticable for them to perform immediately. In reply to Mr.

WARD'S remark, that the banks of Boston had persevered in paying specie without any aid from Government, Mr. S. said, that these banks never gave any aid to the Government, except in one instance, and that was the reason they were sometimes censured in this House.

Mr. SHEFFEY was opposed to this amendment. Every day, he said, which the measure was delayed, would make it more difficult, and the evil would daily become worse and worse. He was in favor of strong measures, and of the shortest time, and was afraid this bill would prove too weak to effect the object in view; but, mild as it was, he was willing to take it, and hoped the session would not be suffered to slip over without something being done. Instead of extending the time, he would prefer the first of November, by which day the banks would be able to sell their Government stock, and be prepared for the change.

Mr. GROSVENOR, in reply to Mr. SMITH, said, there was no law to compel the United States Bank to commence its operations on the first of January; and begged to know if that bank was not to have some protection against the cupidity of the State banks? He would give the State banks a fair and proper time to prepare, on condition that they honestly intended to return to specie payments, and would use all means to do it; and instead of crushing and convulsing the commercial community to every extent, would sacrifice a few per cent. of their Government stock. Would any man tell him they could not sell that stock? They could, if not at par, at something below it. The secret is, said Mr. G., the banks study their own interest solely, and make as much as they can, without considering or regarding the country; in some instances their profits were between fifteen and eighteen per cent. And how did they pay for the stock which they hold? Why, in this very depreciated paper. There was a most powerful reason for not putting off this measure; he did not believe it would be effectual if delayed; it was too weak, and Congress would, at the next session, be beset with the whole weight of the banking influence. It would be deferring the remedy forever; but rather than submit to the disorder, and fasten on the country a paper system, he would amputate the rotten part; rather than submit to the evils which would ensue from such a course, he would, if he had the power, bury them in the earth, and give life to institutions of a sound, healthy, and useful constitution. But, so long as he believed the banks sincere, he would not put them down; he would resort to lenient measures first, and trusted they would be effectual.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, had already said that this subject was one of extreme difficulty; that Government intermeddling with subjects of such delicacy, might involve the country in ruin and destroy many unoffending individuals; that Virginia had passed a law to compel her banks to pay specie on the 15th of November. The result was as might have been expected, and such as ought to cause a doubt, and induce the committee to apprehend consequences of the most serious kind. The bill forbids the Treasury to receive in payment the notes of banks which shall not pay specie after the 31st of December next—that is, it exacts of the banks to do what, he feared, would be found impracticable. The injury will not be to the banks alone; it will fall principally on those who do business with them. A merchant's bond becomes due at the custom-house, he has the amount in one of the State banks, (who do not pay specie,) a check on such bank will not pay his bond; the bank will say, we have not the specie, we cannot aid you. What is he to do? He cannot pay, and his bond will remain unpaid; his credit will be destroyed at the custom-house, and he must (until his bond is paid) pay ready money for all goods that he may thereafter import. He cannot pay, and his goods will be put in the public warehouse, sold at auction for the duties, and ruin and bankruptcy will follow in many instances. He did not know whether a postponement until the 1st of February would cure the evil. He thought that if the time was fixed at the 1st of March it would greatly lessen the danger which was apprehended. Mr. S. then said, that if the Bank of the United States went into operation on the 1st of January, the merchants would offer good notes to that bank or one of its branches for the amount of their bonds, which would be discounted and enable them to pay; that by this means a pressure would be taken from the State banks, and he had a hope, that with forbearance on the part of the Treasury towards those banks which held the public funds, and by sales of United States stock, the banks in the great cities would be enabled to pay specie after the 1st of March. Confidence (which was the all-important) would be restored by two months' paying of specie by the United States Bank; and the State banks, being then better prepared, would make the attempt to recommence specie payments, he hoped, without much danger. But in this opinion he differed with almost all the merchants in Baltimore. They thought specie payments by the banks at so short a day impossible. He again would assert that it was not excessive issues of paper, or excessive discounts to merchants, that occasioned what was called depreciation; that he had seen the balance sheet of two banks of Baltimore, by which it appeared that neither their discounts nor their notes in circulation were equal to what they were in 1812. Yet the notes were not equal in value to those of the Bank of Pennsylvania, whose issues and discounts it had been shown had been excessive. In one of our largest banks, he would state, that its discounts did not exceed its actual capital more than ninety thousand; that its notes in circulation amounted to little more than one-third of its capital; that it had 6 per cent. stock of the United States to an amount nearly equal to the whole it owed for deposits by individuals and by the Treasury; that the deposits of the Treasury in that bank was so small that it fully showed that no loss had arisen to the Government by the receiving of Baltimore paper in payment, and that the Treasury had been able to pay in such paper for the interest of the stock and its debts without loss to the Treasury. Mr. S. further said that the difference of value between Baltimore and Virginia paper had, in a great measure, been owing to the Treasury having (last Spring) drawn from the Baltimore banks $750,000, which were sent to Richmond to pay the debt due to Virginia by the United States. That so large a sum could not fail to have an effect on the exchange between those States. That the bank he had alluded to had lately sold stock in Richmond, and withdrawn their own notes, which, with other banks doing the same, and with the course of trade with the interior of Virginia, would, he hoped, soon lessen the balance that had been against Baltimore; that he had, on a former occasion, shown how the balance of trade had arisen against Baltimore, and in favor of the States to the Eastward; that the exchange had fallen, he believed, since Congress had met, with Boston. He said that it would perhaps not be proper for him to give a view of the Boston banks, but this, he hoped, he might be permitted to say, that if the drain of their specie progressed as it had done between June and January last, they would be in a pitiable situation. Connecticut, he said, would feel the operation of the bill; her banks were called specie banks, but they paid no specie—their business was done, he believed, in New York bank notes; thus, when they discounted merchants' notes, they contracted that they were neither to pay specie nor their own notes; they were to pay in the notes of the banks of New York. He said that it was believed that the banks of New York had as much, if not more, notes in circulation, in proportion to their capital, than those of Baltimore; yet their paper was 8 per cent. better, both paying in notes, and neither in specie. It had been represented to him that some of the banks of the interior of New York have issued their notes to an excess, and yet their notes were better in the market than those of Baltimore; which did not prove a depreciation, but that the balance of trade was greatly against Baltimore and in favor of New York, a circumstance that will cure itself in a few months perhaps.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WARD) had pressed this subject with great zeal. He had said that the State he represented paid more real value to Government for public dues than any other State. The gentleman is mistaken. Last Spring they paid much less; for dollars were then purchased in Baltimore at 5 per cent., Treasury notes at par; at which time the merchants of Boston paid their bonds in Treasury notes, which, he believed, they purchased at 15 per cent. below par; at this time they paid in Treasury notes which cost 8 per cent. below par. They have, therefore, on the average, paid their public dues on at least equal terms with those of Baltimore. The same gentleman has said that the merchants and banks of Boston had received no aid from Government. Was it no aid when they were enabled to pay the public dues in Treasury notes, which on an average of the year saved them 10 per cent? If, however, the merchants, or the banks of Boston, received no aid from Government, the gentleman ought to recollect that they refused all aid to the Government when the banks and merchants in the Middle States contributed to the support of Government to the extent of their means. Mr. S. concluded by saying that he could not vote for the bill without an extension of time.

The question was taken on Mr. SMITH's motion, and negatived—ayes 48.

Mr. SHARPE moved to revive and incorporate in the bill, the fourth section originally reported, but subsequently withdrawn by the Committee of Finance, laying a high stamp duty, about ten per cent. on the notes of all banks failing to pay specie from and after the 31st of December next.

Mr. SHARPE said, he was induced to propose this amendment, partly from the arguments of gentlemen who had opposed the bill. He was sorry that the committee who reported the bill consented to strike out this section; and in listening attentively to the arguments against the other provisions of the bill, he was still more clearly convinced of the importance and necessity of this section. What, said Mr. S., are the arguments that have been used against this bill? Not a justification of the banks that had violated their contracts, for them they cannot venture to justify; but that this is a measure that will operate most severely upon the people, and the banks will save themselves, if required to pay specie, by refusing to discount, and by calling in their paper which is in circulation; and that will distress the whole community, particularly the mercantile interest, who have large accommodations. Under these circumstances, the people will not have money to pay their taxes. As you reduce the circulating medium, you will reduce the price of produce, lessen the value of land and labor, and produce a stagnation of all kinds of business.

If these arguments, said Mr. S., are entitled to weight, they establish one of two facts, either that the banks are never to resume specie payments, and we must tolerate them in that course of dealing; or that, if we are to compel them to resume specie payments, our measures should be made to operate on them directly, (which is the very thing intended by this amendment,) and not indirectly, which will be felt by the community as well as by the banks. He would ask gentlemen if the first was admissible in principle, or if they had the most distant idea that every little banking company throughout the Union was to give a circulating medium to the country; and that Congress, who have to establish the current coin of the nation, shall not control them?

Many of the State banks, he was convinced, would be prepared at any day Congress should appoint, to resume specie payments, but they cannot commence while others are suffered to do business without paying specie; it must be simultaneous in every part of the nation, or those banks that attempt to do a specie business cannot discount or make any profits, while those banks that do not pay specie will do all the business and make all the profits; the notes of banks that pay specie will be scarce as specie itself, while the notes of other banks will occupy all the avenues of circulation. This was evidenced by the fact: those banks which pay nothing for their paper, are dividing a profit of from twelve to fifteen per cent., while the banks in New England that pay specie divide only from three to four per cent. You acknowledge this fact, said Mr. S., when you state that if the banks are compelled to pay specie, they will make no dividends this year. This accounts for their unwillingness to pay specie; it is not expected that moneyed institutions, whose only instinct is gain, will be willing voluntarily to give up exorbitant profits. During the war they had an apology for stopping payment: they had loaned largely to Government, and were unable to sell their stock without loss; this some gentleman say was patriotism, for which they are entitled to our greatest indulgence. I must acknowledge for one, said Mr. S., that my gratitude is not as great as it would have been for their patriotism, if they had loaned their money at a profit of from six to eight, instead of from fifteen to twenty per cent. I recollect their patriotism was very fairly measured by the profit they made, and if they loaned us their paper they made us pay for it. I do not complain of this, it was fair; they had a right, as money dealers, to make the best bargain they could, and they did so. It is our duty to comply with our contract; when we have done that, we owe them nothing, no, not even gratitude. There was nothing gratuitous in their favors; we bought them, and we will pay for them. During the war the defalcation of the banks was tolerated from necessity, and on the return of peace no immediate steps were taken against them; we were then induced to believe, they would resume payment in six or eight months, at the farthest; it is now above fourteen months, and we are told they are less prepared to pay specie than they were at the close of the war; that the balance of trade has been against us, and the money has been all exported. This bill proposes to give near one year longer, and yet we are told this is not sufficient time, and that the whole country is to be distressed by the measure. Those moneyed institutions, said Mr. S., will always think it too soon; they will never be prepared for paying specie; fourteen months has found them less prepared than at the close of the war; one or two years more and they will persuade you the measure is wholly impracticable. Whenever an attempt is made to compel them, as individual citizens are compelled, to pay their contracts, they will commence curtailing their discounts, and produce such pressure on the community as will excite a strong interest in their favor, and it will be found impracticable to pass an efficient measure on the subject. This course of theirs is conclusive to my mind, said Mr. S., that they do not intend resuming specie payments; for, if they did, they have the means in their power without the least oppression to the community. What was the principal reason for their stopping specie payments? It was owing to their permanent loans to Government, of greater amounts than they could pay; that stock, which many of the banks got at a reduced price, can now be sold in the market at a profit of from five to fifteen per cent.; they have only to convert it into money and they are prepared to resume specie payments at once. They are not willing to do this, because it is not their interest; they can make more profit by issuing notes they never mean to pay. Their opposition to this bill was full evidence of that fact. This bill, Mr. S. said, without the proposed amendment, is an indulgence, not a coercion; it gives till the first of next January, before the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to refuse the paper of all banks in payment of the revenue, unless they pay gold or silver for their notes. Without this bill, the Secretary has a right to refuse their paper, or indeed he has no right to receive it at all, and may issue his order to-morrow, directing it not to be received. Yet we are told that such an order, issued on the first of January next, will be ruinous. Shall any other rule of morality, said Mr. S., govern the transactions of those corporations than is applied to the contracts of individuals? If an individual refuses to fulfil his contract, it is held disreputable, and he is prosecuted and made to pay costs and damages; executions are levied on his property, and it is sold at any price it will bring; his wife and children are turned out of house and home upon the world's cold charity, and he thrown into prison. When those banks have done the same act, and even refuse to pay interest on their debt, where they fail to pay the principal, they are held to be free from censure or reproach. My sentiments of justice, said Mr. S., are not so pliant as to consider the conduct of a community of men in any different point of view from the conduct of an individual; numbers divide responsibility, but the act is the same; there is no good reason why they who will post the name of one of their customers as dishonored if he does not meet his contract to a day, shall be allowed to violate theirs with impunity. It is indispensable, they must pay their debts honestly, or it is our duty, said Mr. S., to compel them to do it; and if this measure is not adequate, we must resort to a bankrupt law, and sell all their effects. Legislators who will tolerate this violation of contracts can have but little regard for the morality of the country.

The delinquency of the banks, said Mr. S., is a species of speculation upon the whole community; it is nothing less than taxing the whole nation. Where paper is issued at a value from which it depreciates, the whole amount of depreciation is a clear loss to the community, and is the same as paying the tax to that amount. Say that the banks who do not pay specie have issued ten millions of dollars at par, in the course of one year that sum depreciates ten per cent.—one million is the loss to the community, and is the same as if the money had not depreciated, and they had paid one million in taxes. The evil does not rest here, said Mr. S., but it is a fraud upon the revenue, and consequently upon all the Government creditors. The taxes are paid in an inferior currency, and the Government has to pay the same to its officers, and that is paying them less than what is due them. As the depreciation is not uniform, the revenue is unequally paid by different sections of the Union, according to the difference of value of the several kinds of papers in which it is paid. Say the depreciation of Baltimore paper is twelve per cent., and Boston three per cent., the people of Baltimore pay nine per cent. less in taxes and imposts than those of Boston. By paying nine per cent. less on their imposts they can afford to sell their goods lower, and in that manner engross the custom of the interior country which depends on the seaport towns for its goods. Hence it is not only the interest of the banks that their paper should depreciate, but it is the interest of importing cities that they lighten their dues to Government. This, said Mr. S., is an evil of no small magnitude; it is taking deep root in society, and entwines itself with all the large moneyed interests of the community. Had it not been for this disease of the circulating medium, would Congress, he said, have been induced to charter a National Bank? Was it not as a remedy for this evil that the bank was mainly intended? And was not that remedy to be effected by the National Bank's being compelled to pay specie for its notes and giving a currency of an uniform value and at all times equal to gold and silver? If this was the object, it will never be accomplished, said Mr. S., so long as our revenue is allowed to be collected in an inferior paper; no man will pay in the paper of most value when the other will do as well, and he can make ten or twelve per cent. in the exchange. I also view this measure, said Mr. S., as necessary to aid and protect your National Bank when it goes into operation. If these banks are not compelled to resume specie payments, they will have it in their power to purchase the bills of the National Bank and draw all the money out of its vaults, and compel it to stop payment or quit business. That we have the right to impose this additional tax on them, said Mr. S., I have no doubt—that it is good policy to impose it is equally obvious; otherwise we are to suffer them to give a depreciated circulating medium to the country, to the prejudice of our revenue, and to the injury of commerce. These are some of the considerations, said Mr. S., that induced me to move this amendment; and I hope they will induce the Committee to adopt it; and if this bill shall not then be sufficient to produce the desired effect, at the next session of Congress it is to be hoped measures more efficient will be resorted to.

Mr. BARBOUR said, that, as the section now proposed (by Mr. SHARPE) to be introduced as an amendment, had been stricken from the bill by the committee which reported it, he had not expected that it would have been offered again; but, as it was brought forward, he would offer to the Committee a few ideas which had suggested themselves to him upon the spur of the occasion, for the purpose of showing that the proposed amendment ought not to be adopted. He said that he was fully sensible of the evil under which the country labored, in consequence of the depreciation and varying value of the circulating medium; that he was as desirous as any member of the Committee to apply a proper remedy, but he was desirous also to be duly careful, both as to the character and extent of that remedy, and particularly that one should not be applied which was worse than the evil which it was intended to cure. In the first place, then, it behooved the Committee to consider well whether they had the right to enact such a provision. He did not mean to affirm that they had not the right, but he thought it somewhat questionable.

The section now offered proposed to impose an enormous stamp duty, with a proviso that it should be mitigated in relation to such banks as should by a given day make payment of their notes in specie. The object evidently was not to raise a revenue, but to operate as a penalty for the purpose of enforcing another object—namely, specie payments. It was in its character of penalty that he thought the doubt resided.

These institutions have been incorporated by the States, whose power so to do has not been called into question. If then the Governments which created them be willing, under imperious circumstances, to dispense them from the necessity of specie payments, he asked if it would not be going very far for the Committee to say that they should incur a heavy penalty for not doing that from which they were absolved by the power creating them? But, he said that it was not necessary to press that point, inasmuch as there were considerations of expediency, which seemed to him sufficient to reject the provision.

If, he said, a direct appeal to the interest of the State banks be a sufficient motive to induce them to pay specie, then he thought that the bill, without the proposed amendment, contained provisions of a character strong enough to produce the desired effect. These provisions were, first, a withdrawal of all the deposits of Government from such banks as should not pay specie by the 1st of January, 1817; secondly, that the notes of such banks should not be receivable in taxes and debts to the Government. If, notwithstanding these provisions, the banks should not pay specie, he thought it fair to infer that the reason would be an inability to do so; and he asked, whether a severe penalty, imposed upon institutions for not doing that which they might be unable to do, would not be an act of harsh legislation?

Let us examine, said he, the extent of this penalty: a single example will suffice to show it. The amendment proposed a stamp duty of fifty dollars upon every note above one hundred dollars, and not exceeding five hundred dollars. Now, no person could say, with certainty, that the banks would be able to resume specie payments by the 1st January, 1817. Some gentlemen thought that they would, others that they would not be able to do so. The effect of this provision, then, would be to put an entire stop to the operation of all these banks which might be thus unable; because, to continue business under such stamp duties would be altogether out of the question. Such is the effect which this provision might have upon the banks themselves. Let us now inquire, for a moment, what might be its operation upon the circulating medium of the country, and consequently upon the interests of the community.

It seems to be agreed on all hands that the banks have not, at this time, anything like specie enough. It has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on National Currency, that the quantity in the banks amounted to about fifteen millions of dollars, while it is probable that the paper in circulation is near seventy millions. It will be borne in mind, also, that of the quantity which we have already, much too small, a considerable portion must be drawn, if not from the State banks, from the stock in the country, to supply the demand of the National Bank. It is said, however, that the banks have stock, by a sale of which they can procure it. Not to mention the difficulty that there might be in converting so much stock in so short time into specie, let it be remembered that, of the two hundred and sixty banks in the United States, a very large number of them have either none or very little stock. The only means, then, by which the banks could enable themselves to take up their notes with cash would be by curtailing their discounts and drawing in their debts. A moderate and well-regulated system of curtailment was not to be objected to. Such a one the present provisions were calculated to produce; but there was great reason to fear, if this provision should be adopted, that, under the terror of such an enormous penalty, the banks would be driven into so large and severe a curtailment, that it would produce a most distressing pressure upon their customers, and, through them, inflict the deepest wounds upon the community at large. The effect of curtailment resulted from this circumstance, that as bank paper had filled up the channel of circulation to the exclusion of specie, every operation of this sort necessarily diminished, to an extent equal to its amount, the quantity of circulating medium, or currency of the country, out of which alone the amount of succeeding curtailments could be paid. If this process were conducted with moderation, although inconvenience must, to a certain degree, be the inevitable result, yet the very circumstance of its moderation would make it tolerable; but if, on the contrary, it were violent in its operation, such a great and sudden drain of the circulating medium would be produced as would make it intolerable.

The whole subject seemed to him to be reducible to this single proposition, either the banks will or will not be able to pay specie at the time required. He hoped they would be able. If they should, then the provisions already in the bill, addressed themselves sufficiently to the interest of the banks to make them pay it. If they should not, then the proposed tax or penalty, call it by what name you please, would be as unjust and oppressive in its principle as it would be ruinous in its consequences. He should therefore vote against the amendment.

Mr. HOPKINSON was also opposed to the motion made by Mr. SHARPE, and thought the House could not pursue that course one step further. He was decidedly of opinion that the power proposed by the amendment could not be constitutionally exercised; and this opinion, he said, was not ideal. The stamp duty proposed to be laid on the notes of the delinquent banks had been called a tax; but was it not a fact that this duty was to be contingent, that it compelled the State banks to pay so much money unless they performed a certain act? Was this of the nature of a tax? Mr. H. said it was a penalty on the banks; a penalty inflicted without the decision or sanction of a court of justice. Such a procedure could by no means be considered in the light of a tax, from which it differed most essentially. A tax was unconditional, imperative, and impartial; the duty proposed, as had been remarked, was penal, contingent, and operated as a punishment upon the banks. Mr. H. denied that any such power could be derived from the Constitution, in which no such right existed. It would also be a violation of contract with those institutions, many of which had paid large sums of money for their charters; and was it for any power to alter or infringe the conditions of those charters? Mr. H. believed the proposed measure so unwarrantable, so obviously wrong, he thought the House could not hesitate in rejecting it, and trusted it would not prevail.

Mr. GROSVENOR replied to Mr. HOPKINSON. He had not one doubt of the right of Congress to exercise this power. Not a principle, he said, existed in this bill which had not been involved in every stamp act ever passed by the Government. Mr. G. argued at some length, and declared that not a doubt existed in his mind as to the right. The justice and expediency of the clause, he said, was another question. The object in view was to enforce, as soon as practicable, the resumption of specie payments. Now, Mr. G. said, he was willing to refrain from any measure of a strong character for the present; he was willing to give ample time and opportunity for the banks, by their own operations, to heal the disorder. He would now take the bill as it stood, although he considered it as a measure of little efficacy or consequence. Mr. G. said, he had great hopes that the banks, by prudent measures, by selling their Government stock as soon as possible, and thus diminishing their paper and increasing their specie, would make such progress towards a state of health as to render any further proceedings unnecessary. If, however, the contrary should happen; if from any motives no proper efforts should be made to remedy the present disordered state of their paper, he would not hesitate to say that it would be the duty of Congress to resort to all strong and effective measures within their power, to compel the banks to perform their duty to their country and to their fellow-citizens. He was, however as he before said, for waiting; for giving the banks full time; and therefore hoped Mr. SHARPE would not press his motion to a decision, but allow the bill to pass in its present shape.

Mr. CLAY said a few words on the same side. He was averse to so rigorous an act at present; he wished first to adopt softer measures and see whether the banks would resume the payment of specie. If they did not, Mr. C. pledged himself to go with gentlemen hereafter in any measures to coerce the banks into their duty. He hoped, however, his friend (Mr. SHARPE) would not, at this time, urge his motion.

Mr. SHARPE, after observing that though all his friends seemed to regard his motion favorably, in principle, yet appearing to think it improper at present, he would not now press it without their support, and accordingly withdrew it.

After an ineffectual attempt by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH to carry an amendment—

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, moved to carry the act into operation on the 1st of May next, instead of the 31st December.—Negatived by a large majority.

Mr. WARD moved, also, an amendment providing a graduated scale of value, by which the notes of certain banks should be received in payment; which motion was also negatived.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill without amendment; when Mr. WEBSTER suggesting an amendment which he deemed necessary, but not having prepared it, and the hour being late, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried.

THURSDAY, April 18.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of the messengers attached to the several offices in the Departments of State, Treasury, War, and Navy, and the office of the Board of Navy Commissioners, respectively praying an increase of compensation.—Laid on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from WILLIAM PINKNEY, resigning his seat as a member of this House from the State of Maryland, having accepted the appointment of Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at the Court of St. Petersburg, in Russia.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of George T. Ross, Daniel T. Patterson, and the officers and men lately under their command; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of David Gelston and Peter A. Schenck.

Mr. LOWNDES also reported a bill to allow drawback of duties on spirits distilled and sugar refined within the United States; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means upon the subject of revenue.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to enable the levy court of the county of Alexandria to lay a tax for the purpose of defraying the expense of erecting a jail and court-house; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to establish a land district in the Illinois Territory, north of the district of Kaskaskia; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit:
An act for the relief of David Coffin, Samuel and William Rodman, and Samuel Rodman, jr.;
An act providing for cases of lost military land warrants, and discharges for faithful services; were severally read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate "concerning field officers of the militia," was read the third time, and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the bill to authorize the survey of two millions of acres of the public lands, in lieu of that quantity heretofore authorized to be surveyed in the Territory of Michigan, as military bounty land; and the said bill being further amended, was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to establish a land office in the Illinois Territory, north of the district of Kaskaskia," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill providing an additional compensation, for extra services, to the Judge of the Southern District of the State of New York, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to a third reading.

The bill from the Senate concerning the entry of vessels at the port of Middletown, and the bill concerning pre-emption rights in Louisiana, Missouri, and Illinois, severally passed through Committees of the Whole, and the committee on the former obtained leave to sit again. The latter bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide a system of navigation for the United States.

The bill having been read through, and no amendment being offered, the Committee rose, and reported it without amendment; when

Mr. FORSYTH intimating that he wished to offer some amendments which the lateness of the hour did not this day permit, moved to lay the bill on the table until to-morrow; which was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the President of the United States enclosing a report from the Secretary of State, in pursuance of a request of the House, of 17th February last, exhibiting a table of the duties imposed on American articles in the British possessions of Canada and Nova Scotia; which letter, &c., were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. PLEASANTS, one of the Representatives from the State of Virginia, laid before the House the following communications; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, By the Senate and House of Delegates of the Commonwealth of Virginia, that it is inexpedient to adopt the amendments aforesaid.

Resolved, also, That the Governor be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit copies of the aforesaid resolution to each of the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress, and to the Executive of each State of the United States, with a request that the same be laid before their respective Legislatures.

Agreed to by the House of Delegates, February 13, 1816. WM. MUNFORD, C. H. D.

February 16, 1816—Agreed to by the Senate.

TILLO. HANSFORD, C. S.

The Legislature of North Carolina having proposed the following as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

That, for the purpose of choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts equal to the number of Representatives to which each State may be entitled.

Those districts shall be formed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants entitled by the Constitution to be represented. In each district the qualified voters shall elect one Representative, and no more.

That, for the purpose of appointing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts equal to the number of Electors to which each State may be entitled. Those districts shall be composed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants entitled by the Constitution to representation. In each district the persons qualified to vote for Representatives shall appoint one Elector, and no more. The Electors, when convened, shall have power, in case any of those appointed as above prescribed, shall fail to attend, for the purposes of their said appointment, on the day prescribed for giving their votes for President and Vice President of the United States, to appoint another, or others, to act in the place of him or them so failing to attend.

Neither the districts for choosing Representatives, nor those appointing Electors, shall be altered in any State, until a census, and apportionment of Representatives under it, made subsequent to the division of the State into districts, shall change the number of Representatives and Electors to which such State may be entitled. The division of States into districts hereby provided for shall take place immediately after this amendment shall be adopted and ratified as part of the Constitution of the United States, and successively afterwards, whenever, by a census, and apportionment of Representatives under it, the number of Representatives and of Electors to which any State may be entitled shall be changed. The division of such State into districts for the purposes both of choosing Representatives and of appointing Electors shall be altered agreeably to the provisions of this amendment, and on no other occasion.

Resolved, by the General Assembly of Virginia, that it is expedient to adopt the said amendment.

Resolved, also, That the Governor be, and he is hereby, requested to forward to the Executive of each of the States in the Union, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, a copy of the above preamble and resolution; and that our said Representatives be requested to use such means as to them may seem expedient to cause the amendment aforesaid to be proposed by Congress to the Legislatures of the several States in the Union for their adoption.

February 20, 1816—Agreed to by both Houses of the General Assembly.

WM. MUNFORD, C. H. D.

PRIVATEER ROGER.

The engrossed bill to allow the privateer Roger the bounty for certain British prisoners, was read the third time.

Some debate again ensued on the propriety of awarding this bounty. Messrs. GASTON, LYON, and CADY, opposed the bill, mainly on the ground, that all prisoners were, and of right ought to be, free from the ratification of the treaty, agreeably to the terms thereof, and the usages of nations; that the prisoners were not desired by the United States after the war had terminated; and that there was in law or equity no title to the bounty on the part of the claimants, &c. The claim of the captors was advocated by Messrs. SHEFFEY, NELSON, and WRIGHT, who rested their support on the stipulations of the treaty, and our own law encouraging the capture of enemy seamen, by offering a bounty therefor; arguing, from the condemnation of the vessel, &c., that the capture was legal, and that the prisoners were as good prize as the vessel itself, which has been awarded to the captors. The debate took a wide scope, embracing points of the law of nations, the law of prize, &c.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The unfinished business of yesterday, the bill providing for collecting the debts due to the United States in the lawful money of the country, being called by the Speaker,

Mr. CALHOUN stated that it was the wish of several gentlemen that the bill should be laid on the table until to-morrow, it being in contemplation to offer a section to authorize such an issue of Treasury notes as would supply the deficiency of the circulating medium which might be produced by the banks calling in their notes, and providing a relief for the community under the pressure which would consequently ensue. He, therefore, moved to lay the bill, for the present, on the table; which motion was agreed to.

CAPITOL SQUARE.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making an appropriation for graduating, enclosing, and improving the Capitol Square.

Mr. TUCKER moved an additional section to the bill, providing for the appointment of one Commissioner of the Public Buildings, instead of the three now in commission, and repealing the authority under which they were appointed; and vesting in him the application of the present appropriation, the superintendence of the improvements of the square, &c., with a salary of $2,000 per annum.

After considerable debate, in which Mr. NELSON opposed the motion, and Messrs. TUCKER, CLAY, WEBSTER, and PICKERING advocated it, the amendment was adopted.

Mr. INGHAM moved to postpone the operation of the bill to the 1st of June, which was negatived; and Mr. TUCKER proposed to increase the compensation of the Commissioner to $2,500 which was also negatived.

Mr. WILDE moved to incorporate a provision in the bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be sold certain lots, the property of the United States, within the City; the proceeds of the sale to constitute a fund, the interest of which to go to the support of a National University; which motion he supported at some length, urging the propriety of such policy as tended to foster and benefit the City, and censuring that hostile spirit, which, after Congress had determined to make it the permanent Seat of the Government, yet withheld any aid in its improvement, and left it to languish in a state which made it odious to those who were brought here on the public business, &c.

Mr. WEBSTER suggested the impropriety of connecting the proposition with the present bill, which it might endanger without being itself successful, &c.; after which Mr. WILDE withdrew his motion.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill and amendments to the House; and the latter were further amended, on motion of Mr. TUCKER, by inserting a clause to prohibit the Commissioner, while serving as such, from holding or exercising any other office.

Mr. TUCKER then renewed his motion to increase the compensation of the Commissioner, but without success.

The amendments of the Committee, as amended, were concurred in by the House, and the question put on ordering the bill to a third reading; when

Mr. WRIGHT moved to strike out so much of the first section as provided the appropriation for improving the Capitol Square.

The motion was opposed by Mr. WEBSTER, and Mr. WRIGHT replied, and asked for the yeas and nays on the question, which were refused by the House; after which the motion was rejected. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

After refusing to take up one or two bills which were called up, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 19.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of the Trustees of Phillips's Academy, in Andover, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that the duties imposed on several invoices of books imported for the use of the said Academy may be remitted, and that they may be permitted to import other books free of duty.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WILKIN, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill making appropriations for carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Cherokee nation of Indians, concluded at Washington on the 22d day of March, 1816; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be printed — copies of the book entitled “Laws, Treaties, and other Documents, having operation and respect to the Public Lands, collected and arranged pursuant to an act of Congress, passed April 27, 1810.”

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Elections, in the case of the election of Wm. McCoy, a member from Virginia, whose seat is contested by Robert Porterfield. The Committee of the Whole concurred in the report of the Committee of Elections, that Mr. McCoy is entitled to his seat; and the House agreed in the concurrence. So that the sitting member is confirmed in his seat as a Representative from the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole be discharged from a further consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Zachariah Schoonmaker, and that it lie on the table.

An engrossed bill making an appropriation for enclosing and improving the public square near the Capitol, was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the title be “An act making an appropriation for enclosing and improving the public square near the Capitol, and to abolish the office of Commissioners of the Public Buildings, and of Superintendent, and for the appointment of one Commissioner for the Public Buildings.”

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit:

An act to authorize the survey of two millions of acres of the public lands, in lieu of that quantity heretofore authorized to be surveyed in the Territory of Michigan, as military bounty land;

An act providing an additional compensation to the district judge of the southern district of New York;

An act to enable the Levy Court of the county of Alexandria to lay a tax for the purpose of defraying the expense of erecting a jail and courthouse; were severally read the third time, and passed.

The bill making an appropriation for repairing the road from Duck river, in the State of Tennessee, to Madisonville, in the Mississippi Territory, and between Fort Hawkins, in the State of Georgia, and Fort Stoddard, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following bills passed through Committees of the Whole, and were ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow:

The bill appropriating the sum of $2,500 for the purpose therein mentioned. [This money is to be distributed as prize money to Captain C. Stewart, the officers and crew of the United States schooner Syren, being the appraised value of a vessel captured by the said vessel for a breach of the blockade of Tripoli, during the war with that nation in 1804.]

A bill authorizing the payment of a sum of money to John Rogers, and others. [This money, $300, to be given to these persons, of Connecticut, for their gallantry and good conduct in capturing a midshipman and two seamen of the British navy, and as compensation for the value of said prisoners to the United States.]

The bill authorizing the payment of a sum of money to Joseph Stewart, and others. [This money, $1,800, to be given to Stewart and his associates, in the same terms as the above, for the capture of a lieutenant, a midshipman, and a number of seamen and marines.] This bill was also amended, so as to include the case of John Woodward and Mathew Guy, for a capture made in the waters of St. Mary's county, Maryland.

The bill for the relief of Joseph S. Newell. [A land case.]

The House, on motion of Mr. CANNON, took up, in Committee of the Whole, the report of a committee unfavorable to the petition of the heirs of Absalom Tatom; but, on the suggestion of Mr. CLAY, the Committee rose and dismissed the subject, on the ground that it was useless to consider a subject like this, because, even if the report was reversed, a bill on the subject could not possibly be finally acted on the present session.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill to incorporate the Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria; and Mr. T. then moved that the bill be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow. On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The following bills next passed under consideration, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow:

A bill authorizing the formation of a code of jurisprudence for the District of Columbia. [Directing the Judges of the District of Columbia to form and report to Congress, for their adoption or modification, &c., a code of jurisprudence, both civil and criminal; and allowing to the judges, for this service, a compensation of five hundred dollars each.]

The bill concerning vaccination. [This bill proposes to compel the agent for vaccination to furnish, free of expense, to applicants by mail, true and genuine vaccine matter, with instructions for using the same.] Much discussion took place as to the amount of annual compensation to the agent who now is, or hereafter may be appointed. It was ultimately, on motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, fixed at $1,500.

Mr. HUGER made an unsuccessful motion to suspend the intervening orders, and take up the resolution respecting the remains of General WASHINGTON.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, after a few prefatory remarks, moved the following resolutions, which were successively agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to report to the House, at an early day of the next session of Congress, a system for the organization and discipline of the Militia, best calculated, in his opinion, to promote the efficiency of that force when called into the public service.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to report, if there be any, and if any, what, modification or alteration is necessary in relation to the various branches of the War Department, for the faithful excution of their duties; and to suggest any plan which, in his opinion, will promote the public interest and despatch of business, by responsibility of officers, and economy in the execution of the various duties of the War Department.

The bill concerning pre-emption rights to lands in Louisiana, Missouri, and Illinois; the bill to authorize the surveying and making a road in the Territory of Illinois; and the bill allowing pay to persons made prisoners with the revenue cutter Surveyor; severally passed through Committees of the Whole, and were ordered to a third reading.

The bill to organize, class, and arm the militia, &c., and the bill supplemental to the act for the final adjustment of land titles in Louisiana, were postponed indefinitely.

PORTS OF ENTRY.

The bill from the Senate, to provide for the entry of vessels at the port of Middletown, Connecticut, was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON suggested the propriety of letting this bill take the same course as similar propositions brought before the House at this session; all of which, on the recommendation of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, had been referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, to make a general report thereon at the next session.

Mr. MOSELEY replied to Mr. NEWTON, and submitted some reasons in favor of the bill.

Mr. CLARKE, of North Carolina, moved to include in the bill the port of Plymouth, in North Carolina; the petition from which place had been referred, with others, to the Secretary of the Treasury, as mentioned by Mr. NEWTON. Mr. C. briefly supported his motion, in which he spoke against legislating partially on this subject; after which the amendment was agreed to without objection.

The bill was then reported to the House as amended, and ordered to a third reading.

LICENSES—PAY OF MINISTERS.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to reduce the duty on licenses to retailers of spirits, foreign merchandise, &c.

Mr. PICKENS moved that the bill be amended, by inserting a proviso, that no retailer of imported salt, whose stock does not exceed one hundred dollars, shall be compelled to take out license.

The motion was supported by the mover and by Mr. WILLIAMS, and agreed to; after which, the Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate, to increase the compensation of our Ministers resident at the Courts of London, Paris, and St. Petersburg, to the sum of $12,000, instead of the present allowance of $9,000 per annum.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to reduce the sum in the bill to $9,000, so as to leave the salary at its present amount. Mr. R. supported his motion by a number of remarks, to show that the present salary, with the outfit, was sufficient to maintain our Ministers at any of the European Courts, in a style consistent with their comfort, respectability, and dignity. The motion was opposed by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, LOWNDES, GROSVENOR, WRIGHT and PICKERING, who maintained the reverse of Mr. ROBERTSON'S opinions, and argued that the present salary was entirely inadequate to support our Ministers abroad, particularly at the courts named, in a manner suitable to the Representatives of the nation, or in such a style as was common and necessary in Europe to their respectability; and that it was necessary to allow an adequate compensation, to induce men of talents to leave their professions at home to go abroad in the public service, &c. Both sides of the question were argued at considerable length, and a variety of facts and illustrations introduced in support of the opinions urged.

The question was finally decided against Mr. ROBERTSON'S motion; after which the Committee rose, and reported their amendment to the bill first considered, which was concurred in, and the bill ordered to a third reading.

The second bill being reported without amendment, the question on engrossing it was stated; but before it was put, a motion to adjourn prevailed.

MONDAY, April 22.

The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were discharged from a further consideration of the bill from the Senate, "establishing a port of delivery at the town of Bayou St. John," and the bill was ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill "for the relief of the heirs of George Nebinger, deceased," reported the same with amendments; which were read, and, together with the said amendments of the Senate committed to a Committee of the Whole to day.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill providing for reprinting the collection of land laws; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Naval Committee, reported a bill to fix the Peace Establishment of the Marine Corps [reducing it to one thousand non-commissioned officers and privates;] which was twice read and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "for organizing the General Staff, and making further provision for the Army of the United States," with amendments. The Senate have passed a bill "to increase the compensation of the superintendents of the manufactories of arms at Springfield and Harper's Ferry," and a bill "concerning the annual sum appropriated for arming and equipping the militia ;" in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage" were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill "for organizing the General Staff, and making further provision for the Army of the United States" was read, and concurred in by the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR, from the select committee to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "for the benefit of the widow and children of Robert Fulton, deceased," reported the same, with amendments ; which were read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate "to increase the compensation of the superintendents of the manufactories of arms at Springfield and Harper's Ferry" was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate "concerning the annual sum appropriated for arming and equipping the militia," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit :

An act making appropriations for repairing certain roads therein mentioned ;

An act for the relief of Joseph S. Newell ;

An act appropriating the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars for the purpose therein mentioned ;

An act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to John Rodgers and others ;

An act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to Joseph Stewart and others ;

An act authorizing the judges of the circuit court for the District of Columbia to prepare a code of jurisprudence for the said District ;

An act concerning pre-emption rights given in the purchase of lands to certain settlers in the State of Louisiana, and in the Territories of Missouri and Illinois ;

An act allowing pay to certain persons made prisoners with the revenue cutter "Surveyor ;"

An act to authorize the surveying and marking a road in the Territory of Illinois ; and

An act for reducing the duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise ; were severally read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate "establishing a port of delivery at the town of Bayou St. John," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate "concerning the entry of vessels at the port of Middletown," was read the third time as amended, and passed.

Ordered, That the title be "An act concerning the entry of vessels at the ports of Middletown and Plymouth."

The engrossed bill respecting vaccination. This bill was laid on the table, on motion of Mr. SOUTHWARD ; who stated, in making the motion, that a member of the committee which reported the bill, who was at present absent from indisposition, had received important information from the vaccine agent, and also from officers of the Army and Navy ; and had in consequence prepared some amendments which he wished to make to the bill to introduce vaccination into the Army and Navy ; to give time for this, Mr. S. asked that the bill might lie on the table a day or two.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole be discharged from a further consideration of the bill to provide for the widows and orphans of volunteers and militia who have been killed or died of wounds, and from the report of the select committee appointed to revise the rules and orders of the House ; and that the said bill and report be postponed indefinitely.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of David Gelston, Collector, and P. A. Schenck, Naval Officer of the port of New York ; to indemnify them $100,000 damages recovered against them by Gould Hoyt, and others, for the seizure of a vessel, which afterwards proved to be not authorized by law.

This bill also produced some debate. It was opposed by Mr. SHERFF, on the ground that the seizure was made without probable cause, otherwise damages would not have been awarded by the court ; that where an officer thus acts he does so on his own responsibility, and ought not to be indemnified therefor by the Government. The bill was advocated by Mr. LOWNDES at some length, on the ground, generally, that the private property of an officer ought not to be held responsible for acts committed in the discharge of his public duty, acting according to his best judgment. The discussion embraced various considerations arising out of the trial of the case before the circuit court.

The Committee then took up the bill for the relief of George T. Ross and Com. D. T. Patterson and their officers and men, [granting them $50,000 a moiety of the value of the vessels, &c. captured by them from the pirates of Barrataria.]

The bills were reported to the House without amendment. The former, on motion of Mr. TUCKER, was laid on the table, and the latter ordered to a third reading.

The Committee of the Whole to whom was committed the report of the Committee on the Public Lands on the petition of Thomas Carr, the bill for the relief of Bowie and Kurtz, and others, and the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, were discharged from a further consideration thereof, and the said report and bills were postponed indefinitely.

DIRECT TAX.

The House took up for consideration the amendments made by the Senate to the bill from this House, to regulate the assessment of the direct tax, &c., one of which was the addition of a section directing a revision of the assessment and valuation of property in the State of Delaware. The amendment, it appeared, was predicated on a petition of the Legislature of that State, growing out of the alleged injustice of the board of principal assessors, who altered the valuation of property made and reported by the assistant assessors in different counties, so as to produce a very unequal and unjust apportionment of the direct tax among the counties of the State. The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom the amendment had been referred, recommended a disagreement thereto; and the question was on concurring with the committee. The amendment produced a good deal of debate, in which Messrs. CLAYTON, WRIGHT, SHEFFEY, WARD of Massachusetts, and GASTON, supported, and Messrs. LOWNDES and INGHAM opposed the adoption of the amendment. By the advocates of the amendment, it was urged that the conduct of the board of assessors was partial, unauthorized, unjust, and oppressive, and required the revision provided by the new section. The amendment was opposed on the ground that the proper business of the board was to supervise and equalize the valuations of the assistant assessors; that although they had not acted conformably to the letter of the law, still the result of their decision was the same as if they had proceeded in strict accordance with the law, and that it was an error in form only; and that if this amendment were agreed to, it would open a door to endless applications for the revision of assessments, &c. To establish the above points, a variety of arguments and illustrations were used, which protracted the debate to a considerable length. The report of the Committee of Ways and Means was finally disagreed to by a decided majority, and the amendment of the Senate concurred in.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The House proceeded to take up the bill to provide for collecting the public revenues in the lawful money of the country—(to enforce the payment of specie.)

Mr. CALHOUN moved to amend the bill by adding several additional sections, authorizing the issue of — millions of Treasury notes, not to bear interest or be fundable, to be received in all dues to the United States, providing the usual penalties for counterfeiting, &c.

The amendments were ordered to be printed, and the bill was recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of considering the amendments; it being decided by the Speaker that it was necessary to take that course.

In answer to some inquiries by Mr. GROSVENOR, Mr. CALHOUN stated it as his intention to move to fill up the blank with fifteen millions, as the amount of Treasury notes to be issued.

SALARIES OF MINISTERS.

The House then took up the unfinished business of Friday—being the bill from the Senate to increase the salaries of our Ministers at the Courts of St. Petersburg, Paris, and London, [to twelve thousand dollars per annum;] which bill had passed through a Committee of the Whole; and the question now was, whether it should be engrossed and read a third time. This question was decided in the negative—yeas 36, nays 67, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Atherton, Bacr, Betts, Breck-

And so the said bill was rejected.

TUESDAY, April 23.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, on the 23d of January last, reported a joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to cause further observations to be made with a view of ascertaining the longitude of the Capitol, in the City of Washington; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole, to whom is committed the bill to amend the act confirming certain powers of the Levy Court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, passed on the 1st of July, 1812; the bill making an appropriation for completing the centre building of the Capitol; the bill further to extend the judicial system of the United States; and the bill from the Senate "authorizing the appointment of Admirals;" be discharged from a further consideration thereof, and that the said bills be postponed indefinitely.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "making further provision for settling claims to land in the Territory of Illinois;" also the bill "supplemental to the act entitled an act regulating and defining the duties of the judges of the Territory of Illinois and for vesting in the courts of the Territory of Indiana a jurisdiction in chancery cases arising in the said Territory;" also the bill "for the relief of Joseph Wilson;" also the bill "for the relief of the President and Directors of the Washington Bridge Company," with amendments to each, in which they ask the concurrence of this House;

They have passed a bill "for the relief of the legal representatives of Ignace Chalmet Delino, deceased;" also, a bill "authorizing the sale of lots owned by the United States in the city of New Orleans, and for other purposes;" also, a bill "for settling the compensation of the commissioner, clerk, and translator of the Board for Land Claims in the eastern and western district of the Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana;" and a bill "for adjusting the claims to land and establishing a land office for the district of lands lying east of the Mississippi river and island of New Orleans; in which said bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," reported the agreement of the committee to the said amendments.

Ordered, That the said amendments be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the more effectual collection of the revenue in the lawful money of the United States.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the annual provision for invalid pensioners. The details of this bill, embracing additional cases of pension, the increase of former ones, and the various propositions made to insert other cases, with the discussion of the claims, as usual, occupied much time. The bill was finally reported to the House, the numerous amendments were again considered and disposed of, and the bill ordered to a third reading.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide for the more effectual collection of the public revenue in the lawful money of the country—to enforce the payment of specie.

The amendments offered yesterday by Mr. CALHOUN were read, the first section of which provides, substantially, for the issue of Treasury notes to the amount of — dollars, of such convenient denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct; transferrable by delivery; not to bear interest; not to be fundable; to be received everywhere in dues to the United States, and may be re-issued from time to time.

The second, third, and fourth sections provide for the preparing, signing, and issuing the Treasury notes, for paying the expense thereof, and the usual penalties for counterfeiting them.

The fifth section provides, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue said notes upon loan to the Bank of the United States, or any State bank applying therefor, on such terms as he shall deem necessary, having regard to the circumstances of each case, and the security of the United States, at a rate of interest not less than — per cent. per annum; but not to loan to any State bank more than a moiety of their capital paid in these loans; to be reimbursable in three equal annual instalments, computed from the date of the respective loans, and be paid for as they become due in the legal coin, or in Treasury notes. [The moiety, on motion of Mr. SMITH, was subsequently converted into one-fourth.]

The fifth section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue said notes at their par value to individuals, companies, or corporations, and receive in payment therefor the United States'

stocks; but the amount sold for funded debt not to exceed [five] millions; the notes so sold to be taken out of the annual appropriations for the Sinking Fund, and the funded debt thus acquired to be transferred to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and by them applied as the law directs, with other funded debt.

The seventh section makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, annually, to withdraw from circulation and to cancel a portion of said Treasury notes, equal to one-third of the whole amount issued.

The eighth section of the amendments provides that the future issues of Treasury notes, under the act of February 24, 1815, shall not exceed the sum of five millions of dollars.

The amendments having been read—

Mr. CALHOUN moved to fill the blank in the first section with "fifteen" millions; and then, in a speech of some length, stated to the Committee the benefits which were anticipated from the proposed issue of Treasury notes; the aid and relief they would afford to the community, under the pressure which would unavoidably be produced by the banks in the necessary curtailment of their discounts, the withdrawal of their notes from circulation, &c., preparatory to the resumption of specie payments, which the bill would enforce. It was his opinion that the bill would be effectual in producing the payment of specie, without the aid of this feature; but there were others who doubted whether the restoration could be well or safely effected without it; and he wished to afford every facility and relief that could be with propriety given, as well to the banks as to the community.

Mr. ROBERTSON followed in opposition to the amendment, against which he argued at some length. He objected to it chiefly on the ground that it would form an unfortunate and hazardous connexion between the Government and the State banks; extending the indirect influence of the banks, which had been often complained of, to a direct influence; and, instead of compelling the banks to sell their public stock and meet their engagements, would increase their means of resisting the measures to coerce them into the payment of specie.

Mr. CADY spoke against the amendment. It would be reloaning the public funds at five per cent., while the Government of the United States was borrowing at seven; would be collecting the revenues of the Government in its own paper only, and defeating the object of laying taxes; that it would tend to depress our stocks in Europe; that it would be better to give credit to those indebted to the Government at six per cent. a year; that no bank would borrow these notes which meant to pay for them, as it would be giving five per cent. for notes to lend out to its customers; and that the issue of fifteen millions, if they could be kept in circulation, would drive specie out of the country instead of drawing it thither.

Mr. BARBOUR replied to Mr. ROBERTSON, and defended the amendment on the ground of the great assistance it would afford to the community in meeting the state of things which must take place under the pressure inevitably created by the banks in returning to specie payments; his desire to resort to mild means; its accustoming the people to give credit to paper issued under the authority of Government; its embracing and assisting those banks possessing no public stock.

Mr. TUCKER moved to fill the blank with "ten" millions.

Mr. CALHOUN replied to the arguments against the amendment. He had no idea the banks would resume specie payments willingly; they would go into it only because they would see inevitable ruin in refusing; but as they would be compelled to embrace the measure, he wished to give them ample means.

Mr. CUTHBERT made some remarks in favor of the larger sum. Fifteen millions might be used for other purposes than in loaning to the banks; it might be applied to the purchase of stocks, to loans to individuals.

The motion to fill the blank with "fifteen" was lost—ayes 55, noes 59.

Mr. TUCKER then, for the present, withdrew his motion.

The question on agreeing to the first section as an amendment, still in blank, was carried—ayes 59, noes 58.

Mr. TUCKER renewed his motion to fill the blank with "ten" millions.

Mr. WEBSTER stated some objections to the provision in its present shape. He should have no unwillingness to authorize an issue of Treasury notes in another way; to make them payable to the public creditors, he thought, would be preferable to the manner contemplated.

Mr. NEWTON moved the sum of "thirteen."

Mr. GROSVENOR then rose and stated his objections to the proposed issue of Treasury notes, which he viewed as the first attempt yet made to create a paper currency for the country. In this light Mr. G. discussed the subject at much length, arguing against an experiment so dangerous in principle, and which universal experience proved would always end in a depreciated currency, however feasible it might appear in time of peace and tranquillity. When he concluded—

The question of filling the blank with "thirteen" was negatived—ayes 68, noes 62; and the question recurred on the sum of "ten" millions.

Mr. CUTHBERT then replied to Mr. GROSVENOR, and to the arguments grounded on the presumption that this measure was to be a permanent one, and contending that, as the Government had, by long usage, given credit to the present paper, making it in fact the currency of the country, it would be wrong suddenly to discredit this paper and destroy its value in the community without supplying the country with something as a substitute. He viewed the proposition under discussion as one which would produce the happiest consequences.

The question was then taken on filling the blank with "ten," and carried—ayes 66.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to strike out of the fifth section the words "to the Bank of the United States;" which, after some discussion, was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to fix the amount of interest to be required of the banks at three per cent. per annum; and supported his motion at some length, entering somewhat into the general question of the expediency of the measure.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to fill the blank with five per cent., and replied at still greater length than before to Messrs. GROSVENOR, ROBERTSON, and others, who had spoken in opposition.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved six per centum, and added some remarks in support of the opinions he had advanced.

After some further discussion, the motion to fill the blank with six per centum was carried—ayes 55, noes 52.

Mr. SHEFFEY moved an amendment, which would confine the loan of these Treasury notes to such banks only as hold no stock of the United States. Negatived—ayes 45.

The eighth section was then agreed to—58 to 51.

Mr. HALL then proposed to amend the bill by reviving and adding thereto the former fourth section, which imposed a high stamp duty on the notes of the banks not paying specie on the day specified; which motion Mr. H. made some remarks in favor of—stating his object to be to give the solvent banks an opportunity of paying specie, and of putting down those that could not pay; which could only be done by the provision he proposed to renew.

Mr. TUCKER agreed with Mr. HALL in some degree; and proposed to modify the amendment by making it an uniform stamp duty of ten per cent. on all notes issued by the delinquent banks.

Mr. ROOPE spoke against the motion to renew the section, and disputed the power of Congress, under the Constitution, to adopt such a measure, which was of the nature of a penalty, and intended as a punishment that could not constitutionally be inflicted on the banks.

Mr. RANDOLPH also opposed the adoption of this section, to which nothing similar could be found in the code of any nation under the sun. He argued against the measure at some length, and condemned it as anti-republican and dangerous—as adding to the power and patronage of the Secretary of the Treasury, already too great, a discretion dangerous in the extreme, and in effect making his will the measure of taxation.

Before the motion was decided, the Committee rose, reported progress, and was refused leave to sit again, leaving the bill in the House.

WEDNESDAY, April 24.

Mr. HUGER from the committee appointed by a resolution of the 27th of February last, to examine generally into the subject of unsettled balances, made a report; which was read and ordered to lie on the table; when Mr. H. reported a bill to establish the office of Accountant in the Department of State; which was read twice and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Root, from the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, reported a bill supplementary to the several acts organizing the office of Accountant of the Department of War; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, respecting the Patent Office, reported a bill establishing the Patent Office, providing the means of further encouragement to "authors and inventors," and guarding more effectually against frauds and impositions by patentees; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill "supplemental to the act, entitled 'An act regulating and defining the duties of the judges of the Territory of Illinois, and for vesting in the courts of the Territory of Indiana a jurisdiction in chancery cases arising in the said Territory,'" was read and disagreed to by the House.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill "for the relief of the President and Directors of the Washington Bridge Company," was read; whereupon, ordered that this House concur in the said amendment.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "making further provision for settling claims to lands in the Territory of Illinois," were read and concurred in by the House.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill "for the relief of Joseph Wilson," was read and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate for adjusting the claims to land, and establishing a land office for the districts of lands lying east of the Mississippi River and island of New Orleans," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate "authorizing the sale of lots owned by the United States in the city of New Orleans, and for other purposes," was read twice and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the Senate "for settling the compensation of the commissioners, clerk, and translator of the Board for Land Claims in the eastern and western district of the Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Engrossed bills of the following titles: An act concerning invalid pensioners; an act for the relief of George T. Ross, Daniel T. Patterson, and the officers and men under their command; were severally read the third time and passed.

An engrossed resolution "requesting the President of the United States to cause further observations to be made with a view of ascertaining the longitude of the Capitol in the City of Washington," was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act authorizing payment for the court-house of Hamilton in the State of Ohio;" "An act making appropriation for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year 1816;" and "An act for the relief of the supervisors of the county of Clinton, in the State of New York," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of the legal representatives of Ignace Chalmet Delino, deceased," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

QUARTERMASTER'S ACCOUNTS.

Mr. McKEE, from the committee appointed to inquire into the accounts rendered and settled of James Thomas, a deputy quartermaster general in the Army of the United States, and to examine into the accounts connected therewith, made a report, embracing a statement of facts and many documents, but expressing no opinion on the subject, and recommending a more mature examination into the matter at the next session; which report was ordered to lie, and be printed.

The report is as follows:

The committee appointed to inquire into the state of the accounts (rendered and settled) of James Thomas, a deputy quartermaster general of the United States, and also to examine all accounts connected therewith, report:

That the committee have examined the subject referred to them with as much care as a due attention to the current business of the House would permit. When the papers were referred to the committee, it was understood that James Thomas was in the Western country, and a letter was addressed to him at Pittsburg, informing him that a committee was appointed to examine and report on his accounts.

James Thomas arrived in this city on the 12th instant, and made application to the committee to postpone a report on his case to the next session of Congress; the reasons assigned in support of this application are fully disclosed in the papers herewith submitted to the House as a part of this report, from which it will appear that the committee had neither time nor the means of pronouncing on the character of the transaction, or the conduct of James Thomas, without wholly disregarding the statements made by him to the committee.

So far, therefore, as James Thomas is concerned, the committee recommend a postponement of the case to the next session of Congress, so that the case may then undergo a more mature examination than can now be given to it.

The settlement made in this case by the accounting officers of the Government seems to require examination; the settlement was made on the papers and documents now before the committee, and on that evidence alone the settlement, and the principle on which it was made, must stand the test of examination.

Without designing to express any opinion in relation to James Thomas, the committee submit to the House the following statement of the case, as it seems to have been presented to the accounting officers of the Government for settlement, as well as the several occurrences which happened in the progress of the settlement.

On the 22d day of November, 1812, General Smyth, commanding on the Niagara frontier, ordered James Thomas, deputy quartermaster general, to purchase immediately, and deposit at or near Buffalo, flour for five thousand troops for two months, besides the current issues; and Michael T. Simpson immediately thereafter proceeded to purchase flour from the country people, and in effecting the purchase he represented himself as the agent of James Thomas, and entered into a contract in that character. Said Simpson procured, in the vicinity of Batavia and Caledonia, about 1,500 barrels of flour, at or near the average price of $9 per barrel at those places, as it appears from the depositions and certificates of the persons from whom it was obtained.

On the 12th day of December, 1812, Michael T. Simpson charges the United States $29,155 for 2,205 barrels of flour delivered at Caledonia and Batavia, $728 87 commission for purchasing the same, and $2,520 for transporting 630 barrels of flour from Caledonia to Buffalo. Between the 12th of December, 1812, and the 28th of June, 1813, Michael T. Simpson charges the United States for a variety of articles of army supplies, amounting, inclusive of the bill of the 12th of December, 1812, to the sum of $61,192 15½; and James Thomas obtains Simpson's receipts for this sum in nine separate bills and receipts, which he renders as evidence of disbursement made by him on public account.

The late Accountant of the War Department, to whom the accounts were rendered, regarding Michael T. Simpson as a citizen of the country, who had possessed himself of the articles sold to James Thomas with his own funds or credit, and at his own risk, in the ordinary course of business, considered his receipts as good evidence of disbursement. But it was discovered to the satisfaction of the late Accountant of the War Department, before the account was finally settled, that Michael T. Simpson was not a citizen of that part of the country, but merely a wayfaring person seeking employment, and that he had not become possessed of the property sold to the public in the ordinary course of business, or at his own risk, but that he had purchased the same by means of the public funds in the hands of James Thomas. It was also discovered that the flour was charged to the United States at a rate much higher than its actual cost. The late Accountant of the War Department therefore ordered the amount of Michael T. Simpson's receipts (except a part of the receipt for $10,510 25) to be taken from the credits of James Thomas, and suspended until the receipts of those persons from whom the articles were actually purchased should be produced as evidence of the disbursement as well as the cost of the articles. This suspension seems to have been made on the principle that M. T. Simpson was the agent of J. Thomas, and that he was enabled to make the purchases aforesaid from the public funds in his hands. After this decision was made known, the copy of a letter from James Thomas to Michael T. Simpson of the 25th of November, 1812, and Simpson's answers of the 28th of November, and 4th of December, 1812, were filed in the handwriting of James Thomas, with the intention of establishing thereby the existence of a contract between Michael T. Simpson and James Thomas in regard to the flour purchased by said Simpson. This evidence was deemed by the late Accountant insufficient to authorize a change of the decision made; and the account was closed, leaving a balance due to the United States by James Thomas of $133,087 84. From this decision James Thomas appealed to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, and the accounts were sent to the Treasury Department by Peter Hagner, the acting Accountant, by whom they were closed on the 14th day of July, 1814, for re-examination and final adjustment, where they were examined by the Auditor of the Treasury, and $2,411 80 of the suspended items admitted to the credit of James Thomas, leaving a balance due by him to the United States of $130,676 04. The principles settled by the Accountant of the War Department were not changed by the admission aforesaid. The accounts were reported to the late Comptroller of the Treasury on the 8th day of August, 1814, by the Auditor. It appears that the accounts were examined by the late Comptroller, and that he did not alter the balance, or change the principles settled at the War Department; he was, in the opinion of the committee, prevented from deciding finally on the case by a protest filed in his office by James Thomas on the 12th of August, 1814, alleging, amongst other things, that his accounts, since they were rendered to the Accountant of the War Department, had been mutilated and robbed of documents and vouchers belonging thereto. The committee deem it proper to state that this charge of mutilation and robbery is not supported by any evidence yet disclosed.

On the 5th day of April, 1815, James Thomas requested the present Comptroller of the Treasury to permit him to withdraw his appeal, and to submit his case again to the present Accountant of the War Department, together with evidence not before rendered in support of the suspended items in his account. This request was granted, and the accounts were sent to the present Accountant of the War Department on the 6th day of April, 1815. James Thomas filed with the Accountant of the War Department copies of several letters and certificates, which are on the files, relating to the suspended items, and supposed to contain evidence of a contract between Michael T. Simpson and James Thomas as to the flour, and the prices thereof. With regard to these letters and certificates, the committee have sought in vain for the originals, which are not now to be found in the public offices, and the copies obtained by the committee are extracts taken from a pamphlet written by James Thomas in defence of himself.

The Accountant of the War Department restated the account, and admitted the suspended items, for payments made to Michael T. Simpson, to the credit of James Thomas, on the following grounds: 1st. The charge for 2,205 barrels of flour, commission, and transportation, was admitted, because, in the opinion of the Accountant, the evidence aforesaid establishes a contract between Simpson and Thomas for the flour at a specified price. 2d. The residue of the suspended items are admitted to the credit of James Thomas, except $201 10, charged as commission, because it does not appear that Michael T. Simpson, was the acknowledged agent of James Thomas.

The foregoing is, in substance, a correct statement of the settlement of the accounts of James Thomas, and the principles established in the settlement. So far only as relates to the disbursements made by Michael T. Simpson, there are many accounts settled on principles which seem to the committee objectionable, but which must now be admitted. Without entering at all into the question whether or not the copies of letters and certificates filed establish a contract between James Thomas and Michael T. Simpson, the committee will only say that, if the evidence is considered authentic, and sufficient to prove the existence of a contract, it is certainly competent also to prove that Michael T. Simpson misrepresented the state of the market, with a view to his advantage and the public injury. But the committee cannot regard any contract made by a public agent charged with providing supplies for the public, however formal, which is fulfilled by means of the public funds in his hands, in any other light than as a badge of fraud. If such contracts are countenanced and drawn into practice, it must supersede the necessity as well as the propriety of requiring any public agent to render receipts (from those persons who have the articles wanted for public use, procured by their industry, with their own funds, and at their own risk) as evidence of price and payment, because this rule imposes much labor on honest agents, without affording any barrier against fraud and dishonesty. For what is more easy of accomplishment than for a public agent, inclined to defraud the public, to enter into a formal contract with a friend (whose moral feelings suit the occasion) to deliver property suited to the public wants, at a specific price, exceeding the market price, and then, by means of the public funds in his hands, to enable his friend to fulfil the contract for their mutual benefit? Cases may be supposed, and may occur in practice, where contracts made by a public agent to furnish supplies, with the aid of the public funds, which it is the agent's duty to furnish, may be right; but those possible cases must be accompanied with peculiar circumstances, and on those circumstances their justification must rest.

It cannot be doubted that Michael T. Simpson purchased the 2,205 barrels of flour with the aid of the public funds in the hands of James Thomas; and it is worthy of remark that there is no conflict between the depositions filed by Mr. Porter and the copies of certificates furnished by James Thomas: they relate to different parcels of flour—the first are specific as to quantity and price, the latter are general.

The committee, therefore, cannot but regard the principle on which the suspended item for $32,403 87 was allowed as erroneous, and destructive of all accountability. The principle on which the residue of the suspended items were allowed seems to the committee to be equally or more objectionable.

It is evident that the supplies were purchased by means of the public funds in the hands of James Thomas, and intended for the public use, to which they were alone suited. No man in the right use of his reason would have possessed himself of the articles in the prosecution of any ordinary business; and to consider Mr. Simpson unconnected in some way with the public officer is absurd, especially after he had charged a commission on part of his purchases. The receipts of those persons who were the original owners of the property, or who have acquired it at their own risk, is the only good evidence of price and payment, and, in the opinion of the committee, ought, in all ordinary cases, to be required as evidence of disbursement.

WASHINGTON, April 12, 1816.

SIR: I learn that a committee has been appointed by the House of Representatives to examine my accounts with the United States, in consequence of allegations made by William Simmons, late Accountant of the War Department, that fraudulent charges to a considerable amount had been made by me, and allowed, under the special directions of the officers of the Treasury.

As these accounts had already been before a committee of Congress on the representations of this person, and as they had been referred by that committee to the accounting officers of the Treasury for settlement, and had been settled accordingly, I might have expected that such allegations would not have been repeated, at least until the legal tribunals of the country had decided on my complaints for similar calumnies propagated by him, with so much boldness and industry, by means of the public press.

Conscious, however, that my conduct has been in all respects honorable, I can have no objection to any inquiry, however rigid; on the contrary, I am happy to have any opportunity to bring these accusations to the test of truth. I hope the result will set them forever at rest; for, so highly do I value the good opinion of the community, that even the consciousness of rectitude does not render me indifferent to aspersions which strike at my reputation. I trust, however, that the inquiry will be complete, and I am sure it is foreign from the wish of any member of your honorable body to decide on a question which, through life, will affect the character of one of their fellow-citizens, without a full and fair investigation. I ask, therefore, to go before the committee, to know the specific act of criminality with which I am charged, and to be allowed the means which justice demands of substantiating my innocence.

In order that the true situation in which I stand towards the public, whether as debtor or creditor, may be known, I ask, further, that the whole of my claims connected with the discharge of my public duties may be placed before the view of the committee; these are contained in the letters and accounts presented by me to the War Department in the months of December and February last. It will then be seen that, so far from having profited by fraud and imposition on the public, I am, after seven years of active military duty, a sufferer through arduous and laborious exertions in the public service.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
JAMES THOMAS.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

WASHINGTON CITY, April 15, 1816.

SIR: You have applied to the committee to whom your accounts have been referred for a postponement of any decision or report thereon until the next session of Congress, on the general ground that time or opportunity has not been afforded you to procure testimony, explaining such parts of your accounts as seem to be mysterious, and rebutting the evidence tending to charge the accounts with unfairness or fraud. That the committee may have the means of deciding on your application, I am instructed by them to state to you the cases in your accounts most liable to exception, and to request you to say, in answer, whether you can (if time be allowed you) obtain evidence to explain and remove the mystery in which the cases are involved.

1st. The depositions on file (which are numbered progressively from 1 to 16, with the exception of No. 10, which is not with the documents referred to the committee, and Nos 12 and 13, which relate to your defence,) go to prove that Michael T. Simpson purchased nearly fifteen hundred barrels of flour, at a price averaging about $3 78 per barrel; that those purchases were made before the 12th of December, 1812; and Michael T. Simpson, in effecting those purchases, represented himself as your agent, and purchased with the aid of the public money or credit, and not on his own money or credit, or at his risk.

2d. On the 12th day of December, 1812, Michael T. Simpson renders an account against the United States for $32,403 87, composed of the following items, to wit: 2,205 barrels of flour, $29,155; commission, $728, 87; and $2,520 for transporting 630 barrels of flour from Caledonia to Buffalo, making an average price of $13 54 per barrel, including commission, and excluding the transportation; and $4 per barrel for transportation from Caledonia to Buffalo, when it appears by document No. 16 that transportation was offered to you from Caledonia to Buffalo for any quantity of flour at $2 per barrel.

3d. You have introduced copies of letters purporting to have been written by Michael T. Simpson to you, and dated the 28th of November, the 4th, the 7th, and 12th of December, 1812, and your answer of the 6th of December, 1812, as evidence of a contract with Mr. Simpson. The original letters are not with the papers referred to the committee, who have been unable to obtain them from the War or Treasury Department. The copies of the letters of the 28th of November and 4th of December, 1812, are in your handwriting: can the original letters be produced?

4th. Michael T. Simpson purchased other articles, to wit, corn, hay, oats, &c., amounting, inclusive of his flour account, to $61,192; and it is alleged, but not yet in proof, that one of the articles, to wit, the corn, was purchased by him for much less than the prices charged by him.

5th. You have produced two receipts from Daniel Mowry, one for $509 60, dated 5th of December, 1812, and one for $382 20, dated the 20th of December, 1812; and it appears, by reference to the settlement made by the wagonmaster of General Tannehill's brigade of Pennsylvania militia, that Daniel Mowry was attached to the said brigade as a teamster, and was paid by the public at the rate of $4 per day up to the 20th of December, 1812; and from a letter written by General Tannehill, and addressed to the late Accountant of the War Department, the correctness of the whole transaction may be questioned.

6th. You charge the United States with $276, paid to Michael T. Simpson for the hire of three large wagons from the 9th to the 31st of March, both days inclusive, and $216, as paid to said Simpson for the hire of three large teams from the 1st to the 18th of April, 1813, both days inclusive; and by Morgan Lewis's letter to you of the 2d of March, 1813, in answer to a letter acknowledged to have been received from you of the 24th of the preceding month, it appears that the same teams were purchased by you at $1,715, in February, 1813, from Michael T. Simpson.

7th. In the settlement of your accounts, you protested against the late Comptroller of the Treasury proceeding to a decision on your accounts, because, as you state in your protest, your papers are irregularly rendered, were mutilated, and robbed of part of the documents. This charge made by you is not supported by evidence, or accompanied by any specification of the documents alleged to have been mutilated or taken away.

You will say whether or not a postponement to the next session of Congress will enable you to introduce evidence explaining these points, and specify what evidence you expect to be able to procure in explanation of each point. Your most obedient servant,

SAMUEL McKEE.

JAMES THOMAS, Esq.

WASHINGTON, April 17, 1816.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 15th instant, I have to state to you that if, from the partial testimony which may be before the committee, or from the misrepresentations of those who are interested in calumniating me, the transactions to which you have referred should be involved in any mystery, I can produce abundant evidence to remove it. But, as all my papers relating to those transactions are now in the District of Maine, (the place of my residence,) whether they were sent on the final adjustment of my accounts with the Government, and as it may be necessary to call persons who were on the spot and acquainted with the facts to give information on such points as may appear doubtful, it is impossible that a full investigation can be had during the present session of Congress. I pledge myself, however, if time and opportunity be allowed me, to disprove completely every charge of fraud or unfairness which may be alleged or insinuated against me.

With respect to the original letters for which you inquire, I have to inform you that I can prove them to have been exhibited at the offices of the Accountant of the War Department and the Comptroller of the Treasury. Indeed, no copies were produced by me, of which the originals were not also exhibited. But, if the originals in question cannot now be found, I can prove satisfactorily the correctness of the copies. On this occasion, it may be proper to call your attention to the fact, that, since the calumnies against me have been abroad, my accusers and others interested have had access to all the papers relating to my accounts, &c., in the Register's office.

The complaint to which you allude, as having been made by me to the late Comptroller of the Treasury, of the mutilation of my accounts, I can substantiate.

Your letter contains, I presume, all the subjects on which the committee require any evidence or explanation. But, as Mr. Simmons has endeavored to give the impression that his decision on my accounts was sanctioned by the Treasury, I do most unequivocally deny that my accounts were, as he asserts, ever finally settled by the late officers of the Treasury on any appeal from me, or that any balance was struck against me by them. On the contrary, my accounts remained open, in consequence of the suspensions made by Mr. Simmons, until they were finally settled by his successor, whose decision was confirmed by the Comptroller.

I have already told you that, when I first heard of the appointment of your committee, I was at Pittsburgh, on my way from the Lakes to this city, on business connected with the contract in which I was engaged with the Government for subsisting the troops, &c., in the Michigan country, and which requires my speedy return. Since my arrival, I have lost no time in presenting myself before you, and making such representations as appeared necessary. And it remains for the committee to determine whether they will proceed at once in the inquiry with the imperfect evidence which can now be had, or will defer it until all the testimony which the case admits may be laid before them.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES THOMAS.

WASHINGTON CITY, April 18, 1816.

SIR: Your letter of the 17th instant was this morning laid before the committee to whom your accounts have been referred, and I am instructed by the committee to request you to inform the committee whether or not you have any papers or other evidence relating to the points stated in my letter of the 15th instant which has not been produced to the War or Treasury Department, and, if you have, then I have to request you to state specifically what that evidence is.

From your answer to my letter of the 15th instant, you pledge yourself to prove the mutilation of your accounts, and the robbery committed on them in part, as stated in your protest filed with the late Comptroller of the Treasury. You also state that the original letters which passed between you and Michael T. Simpson were filed with the accounting officers of the War and Treasury Department. As the evidence relating to these points must be in the city, the committee will hear any testimony you may think proper to introduce to them this evening at six o'clock, in their committee room, where you will attend.

Your most obedient,

SAMUEL McKEE.

N. B. Will you return to me the original letter to you of the 15th instant, and this letter also, as I have not time to copy them?

S. McKEE.

JAMES THOMAS, Esq.

Interrogatories stated to James Thomas by the committee to whom his accounts were referred, on his application for a postponement of a decision by the committee to the next session of Congress.

Question 1. If time is allowed you, do you believe you can show that the 2,205 barrels of flour delivered to you by Michael T. Simpson at Caledonia and Batavia did actually cost said Simpson, delivered at the places aforesaid, more than $8 78 per barrel, and that the cost to Simpson was near or about the prices charged by said Simpson; and do you expect to establish the facts aforesaid by the receipts or testimony of the persons from whom Simpson made the purchase of the flour?

Answer by James Thomas. I expect to show that much of it was delivered at Caledonia and Batavia to me, by Michael T. Simpson, at or near the price which it cost him delivered at Caledonia and Batavia; and I expect to prove these facts by the testimony of persons from whom said Simpson purchased the flour, and that the transaction was a fair one.

Question 2. Can you show that the rate of $4 per barrel, charged for transporting 630 barrels of flour from Caledonia to Buffalo, was not higher than the usual price at the time it was effected?

Answer. I can.

Question 3. Can you show that the teams purchased from Michael T. Simpson were actually and bona fide purchased by you on the 19th day of April, 1813, and not on the 24th of February, as it would seem they were by the letter of Morgan Lewis of the 2d of March, 1813?

Answer. I can show that the teams were actually and bona fide purchased on the 19th of April, 1813, and not before that time, when I paid for them.

Question 4. Can you make it appear that the account rendered by Michael T. Simpson for hay, oats, corn, and other articles delivered to you, cost him the prices which he charges the United States for the same, and which is paid by you; and that the prices of the said articles, at the time of their delivery to you, were reasonable?

Answer. I can make it appear that the articles mentioned were delivered at or near the cost to said Simpson, and that the prices charged for them were reasonable.

Question 5. Can you account for the public property so purchased and paid for?

Answer. I can, with correctness and ease.

Question 6. Can you make it appear that the money receipted for by Daniel Mowry, was actually paid to him for services performed by him?

Answer. I can make it appear that I employed teams of Philip and Daniel Mowry to transport the flour mentioned in the receipt, and that the service was performed; and the receipt is itself the evidence of payment. And with regard to Mowry's receiving pay at the same time from the United States, I can only say I knew nothing of the fact.

The House then took up the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the more effectual collection of the public revenues in the lawful money of the country.

Mr. CALHOUN withdrew the amendment which he proposed to the bill for the issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. BRADBURY then offered the following provivo, to come in at the end of the first section; which was adopted by the House by a large majority:

"Provided, nevertheless, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as an indemnity or justification to any officer or agent of the Government, for any negligence or misconduct in the past or future collections and receipts of public moneys."

A motion was then made by Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, further to amend the same, by inserting the following section:

"And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which the revenue of the United States, in any section thereof, shall be received in the bills of any State, which bills at the time of receiving them are of less value than their nominal sum in Treasury notes, it shall be the duty of the officer who receives said bills to require the person who pays the same, to make a discount thereon, equal to such difference in value; and it shall be the duty of such officer to render his account under oath, as to the amount of such discount."

This section, after much discussion, was rejected by yeas and nays—yeas 10, nays 100, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Hale, Hanson, King of North Carolina, Marsh, Mason, Nelson of Massachusetts, Noyes, Stearns, Strong, and Ward of Massachusetts.

NAYS—Messrs. Adgate, Alexander, Archer, Atherton, Baer, Barbour, Bateman, Bennett, Betts, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brooks, Bryan, Cady, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Cilley, Clayton, Clendennin, CLOPTON, Conduct, Cooper, Crawford, Creighton, Crocheron, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davenport, Desha, Edwards, Forney, Gaston, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hahn, Hall, Hardin, Hawes, Heister, Henderson, Herbert, Huger, Hungerford, Ingham, Irwin of Pennsylvania, Johnson of Virginia, Kent, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Love, Lovett, Lumpkin, Lyle, Lyon, Mayrant, McCoy, McLean of Kentucky, Milnor, Moseley, Murfree, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Parris, Pickering, Pitkin, Pleasants, Randolph, Reed, Roane, Robertson, Root, Ruggles, Savage, Schenck, Sheffey, Smith of Maryland, Southard, Stuart, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Throop, Tucker, Vose, Wallace, Ward of New York, Whiteside, Wilcox, Wilkin, Williams, Willoughby, Thomas Wilson, Woodward, Wright, and Yates.

A motion was then made, by Mr. MASON, further to amend the said bill by inserting therein the following section:

"And be it further enacted, That, to establish uniformity in the payment of duties and taxes within the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury shall forthwith cause to be published, in one or more newspapers in each State and Territory, a list of all the banks within the United States, the notes of which are thereafter to be received in their respective districts in payment of duties, taxes, and other debts due to the United States; and any debtor of the United States may, until the said 31st day of December next, at his election, pay the amount of any duties, taxes, or other debts due and payable to the United States in Treasury notes, or in the notes of any of the said banks until notice shall be given from the Treasury Department that such notes are not received in discharge of any debts due to the United States within the districts where such banks are respectively situated: Provided, nevertheless, That no collector, or other officer or receiver of moneys due to the United States, shall receive, in payment of any duty, tax, bond, obligation, or other demand, which, according to the terms thereof, or the provisions of law, shall not be due and payable before the said 31st day of December next, the notes of any bank or banker which, at the time of such payment, shall not be payable and paid on demand in current gold and silver coin."

And the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 32, nays 88, as follows:

A motion was then made, by Mr. HARDIN, that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; which, after a good deal of debate, was determined in the negative—yeas 44, nays 64, as follows:

Mr. INGHAM then moved further to amend the said bill, by striking out "31st day of December next," and to insert "31st day of January next," as the time after which the payment of duties, taxes, debts, &c., owing to the United States will be demanded in specie made current by law, or in Treasury notes. The amendment was negatived without a division.

The question was then taken on engrossing the bill for a third reading, and was decided as follows: For engrossing 57, against 46.

The engrossed bill providing for the more effectual collection of the public revenues in the lawful money of the country, was read the third time, and the question stated, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. WRIGHT rose and spoke as follows: Mr. Speaker, before this bill shall be put on its passage, and placed beyond the reach of the real guardians of the people, I must claim the indulgence of the House while I do detect and expose its direful operation and effect on the American people—that people who have so lately crowned themselves with laurels and covered the nation with glory. Sir, I will show that it is fraught with partiality, with ingratitude, with injustice, and with cruelty; and, if passed into a law, and attempted to be enforced, may lead to the most serious and dangerous consequences. Sir, it was but a short time ago when this nation was coerced into a bloody foreign war to avenge her wrongs, and contemporaneously threatened with a serious domestic insurrection, having for its object the severance of this Union; when the patriotism of every American was in requisition; and when the banks were invoked by their patriotism to lend their money (the sinews of war) to save the sinking credit of their bleeding country. And, sir, can we ever efface from recollection the promptitude with which the friendly banks advanced their moneys on loan to the nation, so as to greatly afflict and derange their own concerns; whereby the sinews of war were supplied, the drooping spirits of an exhausted Treasury raised, a patriot Army and Navy fed and clothed, and a glorious war brought to a glorious conclusion by the instrumentality of these friendly banks and the noble exertions of the American people. Nor, sir, can we forget the conduct of the Opposition in the East to prevent the Eastern banks from lending their money, nor its effect. And although, sir, it is an unquestionable fact that in the proportion that these friendly banks extended their loans to the nation, in the same ratio they paralyzed their own means to resume specie payments, and in the same ratio they are now to be sacrificed on the altar of ingratitude; while the Eastern banks withheld their money from the nation, and retained all their means to continue or resume specie payments, and whose friends on this floor are now goading the Administration on this subject, and endeavoring to wreak their vengeance (by the passage of this bill) on the friendly banks for saving the sinking credit of the nation, which the Eastern banks, by withholding their loans endeavored to destroy.

Sir, do not we discover the hand and spirit of persecution in this business? And can we be at a loss, with this evidence before our eyes, to discover the cause? or so far lull to sleep our patriotism and magnanimity as to become accomplices in the fell and unkind stroke meditated at these friendly banks?

Sir, I cannot, in justice to the banks of Maryland, withhold the prideful remark that her banks advanced more money to the United States than the banks of any other State in the Union; nor can withhold my utmost exertions to protect these banks from the injury which the adoption of this bill will inevitably impose.

Sir, that this bill is fraught with partiality can any man hesitate for a moment to affirm, when he observes the different bearing it will have on the banks that did, and did not, loan their money, to resume specie payments; and when the fact is not only well known, but admitted, that, in the ratio of their loans, their powers to resume specie payments are arrested? I have also charged this bill with being fraught with ingratitude. Sir, we all recollect the glow of approbation which filled the patriot's bosom at the time of these loans. The awful crisis was averted by the loans ascribed to the patriotism of these banks, which a traitorous Eastern pen endeavored in vain to arrest, and that gloom that the exhausted state of the Treasury imposed on patriots was entirely dispelled. And can an American friendly to the liberties of his country say that to join the Eastern persecution of these friendly banks in the passage of this bill would not be the blackest ingratitude to those banks? But, however Republics may have been famed for ingratitude, I trust the American Republic will not, on this occasion, suffer the foul stain to pollute her fair fame. I have thus shown that this bill, as it related to the banks, was partial and ungrateful. I will now show, that, as it relates both to the banks and the people, that this bill is both unjust and cruel.

Sir, it is a fact of record that these friendly banks were obliged to suspend specie payments to avoid the whole specie of the country being drained into the hands of our enemies, whose agents were everywhere to be found occupied in that business; and that, however perilous it was to the credit of these institutions, necessity, growing out of the war, beyond their control, compelled the directors of those banks to the measure, which was not only approved by every patriot in America, but by the Government itself. Nor were the Eastern banks, who did not suspend specie payments, freed from the suspicion of being actuated by motives the very reverse of those which induced the friendly banks to suspend specie payments. Sir, from the moment the banks suspended specie payments there was a general understanding that in all the moneyed transactions of this country, the bank paper was to be paid and received in fulfilment of the contracts, although it was well known that specie would not be paid on demand, agreeably to the express tenor of the notes, and there was a certainty that a depreciation would ensue. The contracts of the citizens were made and executed understandingly in this paper, by universal consent, and the price of the article bought and sold was knowingly and intentionally valued by this new standard, so that let the positive letter of the law be even admitted to compel the payment of specie as the only current money, yet, where by universal consent its circulation was suspended, that could not be the case, Conventio vincit leges. "The agreement of the party makes the law;" and it would be unjust to compel a man whose agreement was made after the suspension of specie payments, and with an understanding that it was to be paid in bank paper, to compel the payment in specie.

Sir, it is a fact that, from the well known small quantity of specie in circulation in this country, it is impossible for the banks to assume the payment at this time; and every commercial man knows, that, while the balance of trade is against us, the specie of foreign countries cannot be expected to return to America. If, then, from the small quantity of specie in this country, and the state of our commerce, it is impossible to resume the payment of specie for the necessary quantity of circulating medium for the purposes of the nation, I ask, would it not be as farcical to attempt to coerce it, as it would be to demand of a farrier to extract a certain quantity of blood from a dead horse, when all his blood was congealed in his veins? But, Mr. Speaker, when I record the fact, that there is now in the hands of the people upwards of fifty millions of bank paper, and that the very paper that was loaned by the banks to the Government, and by the Government paid to the people for their supplies for the army and navy, and for their military services, whether that paper ought not to be received in payment for their public dues; and I humbly ask, if the Government pass the bank paper into the hands of the people, purporting to be redeemable on demand in specie, whether the Government are not thereby virtual endorsers, and equitably bound to see the engagement performed, or to take back the note, as much as if it was counterfeit, and give them a good note for it, unless, as I allege, there was a mutual understanding that bank paper was the medium of the contract, and that, too, without its being redeemable in specie on demand. Sir, I ask if a farmer, being executed for his taxes after tendering his money thus received from the Government to the amount of his taxes, was, by replevin, to bring this subject fairly before a court and jury, and the jury were specially to find the facts, that he did tender this money to the amount of his taxes, and had brought the same into court, whether the court would not adjudge him discharged? Yes, sir, the court would so decide; and I very much incline to believe, that if the Secretary of the Treasury, with the champions of this bill, were charged with the collection of the public dues in specie under such circumstances, they would find themselves in an unpleasant box, and that people who had achieved their independence by deposing a foreign tyrant, would not submit to be despoiled of their property so unjustly by domestic oppression.

Sir, when Congress passed the Revenue laws, and imposed the six million and three million land tax, did they contemplate the payment of specie? No; they knew the people had it not, and of course could not pay it. When they borrowed the money from the banks, and compelled all the public creditors to receive it for their debts, can it be possible they intended to refuse taking it back again from the people for their taxes? I cannot conceive the Government capable of such political immorality. Does any man doubt that Congress intended these taxes being paid in bank paper? Nay, has not the conduct of the Secretary, whose administration of the Treasury Department has been so conspicuous for its intelligence and firmness, sealed this construction of the law, by taking the bank paper in discharge for these taxes? Yes, sir; and honorable men have been found on this floor, who have insinuated that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be impeached for receiving the taxes in bank notes. I have differed so materially from these gentlemen, that I have no hesitation in declaring, that, if he had exacted these taxes in specie, he ought, and probably would have been impeached, when it was well known that Congress, when they imposed these taxes, intended them to be paid in bank paper. The Secretary, no doubt, by the letter of the Constitution, might have considered nothing but specie current money, and to have exacted specie, had it depended solely on the Constitution; but when he knew, by all the circumstances of the case, that the taxes were laid, and intended to be paid in bank paper, he had too great a respect for the principles and policy of the Government, and too much patriotism, to have done an act that would have convulsed this Government to its centre, and probably have shaken the Chief Magistrate from his seat; and I advise gentlemen to be upon their guard in the passage of this bill, lest they sour the nation, and disappoint the well-founded hopes of the contemplated successor to the Presidential Chair. Sir, if this bill shall pass into a law, and impose the payment of taxes and public dues in specie, it will, no doubt, have the same effect on the contracts of citizen and citizen, and introduce discord and confusion, and probably destruction to thousands; for every man must know the extreme disstress of the people would labor under, if they were compelled to pay their debts in specie at this time. And I warn gentlemen how they introduce such a state of things, as too serious and dangerous to be attempted, and awful in the extreme, as they were produced by the war, and not by any fault of the people. Gentlemen will excuse me in reminding them of the contests in Rome, between the patricians and plebeians, about the payment of their debts in a time of great difficulty, and the awful crisis produced thereby; it being no less than the appointment of the first Dictator in Rome, who was clothed with absolute despotic power, and who, to appease the plebeians, suspended the collection of the debts due to the patricians for a limited time. I ask, if the advocates of this bill were pressed even for their board in specie, how they could comply with their contracts? Nay, sir, I unhesitatingly declare, that if the boarding-houses were to refuse to board the members but for specie, it would force the members to abandon their seats. This single consideration ought to satisfy every man, that the bank paper was the money contemplated to be paid and received, and induce him to move with caution, and not impose impossibilities on the people. Sir, can we so soon forget what is due to that people, whose star-spangled banners have illumined both hemispheres, and whose stripes have humbled the British Lion, and compelled him to give up our impressed seamen, and subdued the proud Turk, and compelled him to give up our enslaved citizens, and reduced to practice the Eastern gasconade, (for they voted against the Algerine war,) "millions for defence, but not a cent for tribute;" and while the echoing of our conquering cannon at Chippewa, at Plattsburg, at Baltimore, and at New Orleans, is yet hanging on the ear, and while they recollect their victories by sea and land had so raised the American character, that, without the aid of the star and garter, a certificate of American citizenship is a passport into the highest circles of Europe? And yet there are gentlemen on this floor, who would compel the Secretary of the Treasury to play the Dictator, not like the Roman Dictator, with a power to relieve the distresses of the people, but by coercing him to exact the revenue and taxes in specie, to the destruction of the American people.

Indeed, sir, in order to carry this monstrous bill, I discover the most unnatural connexion between gentlemen on this floor. We see those who advocated the United States Bank, upon the principle that the nation had seven millions of its stock, (netting three per cent. revenue,) and the appointment of five of its directors to guard the nation against any improper influence, and who voted against the old bank because seven-eighths of its stock was British, and gave to the foreign stockholders eight per cent., uniting with the Eastern gentlemen, (whose ports had been exempt from British blockades, to the extent represented by the Hartford Convention,) and who voted against the present United States Bank expressly because the United States had any part of the stock, or the appointment of any of its directors, and who voted to continue the old bank charter, when seven-eighths of its capital was the property of British stockholders. And Congress are now pressed by this extraordinary union to sanction this monstrous measure, fraught, as I trust I have proved, with partiality, with ingratitude, with injustice, and with cruelty. Sir, I have endeavored to do my duty to this nation on this occasion; and I confidently hope that this House will reject this bill, and prove themselves to be what they have been justly esteemed, the honest guardians of the interest, the happiness, and the prosperity of the American people.

Mr. Root followed on the same side, in a speech of about half an hour.

Mr. TELFAIR made a few remarks in reply to Mr. Root.

Mr. GROSVENOR answered the opponents of the bill, and spoke some time in its support.

Mr. RANDOLPH replied to Mr. GROSVENOR, and opposed the passage of the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR rejoined, and added some further arguments in favor of the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN also replied to Mr. RANDOLPH, and offered some considerations in favor of the bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON explained the reasons why he should vote for the bill, and made some remarks in reply to other gentlemen.

Mr. WEBSTER also submitted his reasons for wishing the bill to pass.

Mr. RANDOLPH again spoke about an hour in opposition to the bill, and in reply to its advocates.

Mr. WRIGHT also opposed the bill in a second speech.

Mr. GASTON submitted his reasons in opposition to the bill; after which the question on its passage was decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 60, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Atherton, Bassett, Bateman, Boss, Bradbury, Brown, Cady, Calhoun, Champion, Chipman, Cilley, Condict, Conner, Creighton, Cuthbert, Desha, Edwards, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hale, Hawes, Huger, Hungerford, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent, Love, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Marsh, Mayrant, McCoy, McLean, of Kentucky, Middleton, Nelson of Massachusetts, Noyes, Ormsby, Parris, Pickering, Pitkin, Pleasants, Reed, Reynolds, Robertson, Rugles, Schenck, Sharpe, Sheffey, Stearns, Sturges, Taggart, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Tucker, Vose, Ward of New York, Webster, Wilcox, and Woodward.

So the bill was rejected.

THE TARIFF.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the amendments of the Senate to the bill to regulate the duties on imposts and tonnage. The amendments were successively agreed to by the Committee, and reported to the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH made an ineffectual motion to postpone the decision on the report until to-morrow, believing the amendments too important to be acted on without more mature consideration.

Mr. R. opposed subsequently, at some length, the Senate's proposition to increase the duty on imported sugar from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 cents per pound, which he deemed not only oppressive on the people, but highly improper as coming from the Senate, whose right he disputed, according to the spirit of the Constitution, thus in effect to assess a tax on the people, and demanded the yeas and nays on the question of concurrence.

Mr. ROBERTSON made a few remarks in reply, and in favor of the amendment.

After some further conversation between Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. ROBERTSON, the amendment was concurred in by the following vote: For the amendment 54, against it 48, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adgate, Alexander, Archer, Atherton, Bassett, Bateman, Betts, Brooks, Cady, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chipman, Condict, Crawford, Creighton, Crocheron, Cuthbert, Darlington, Desha, Griffin, Hall, Hardin, Hawes, Henderson, Ingham, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Mason, Mayrant, McKee, McLean of Kentucky, Middleton, Newton, Ormsby, Pleasants, Powell, Reynolds, Robertson, Root, Savage, Schenck, Sharpe, Smith of Maryland, Southard, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Tucker, Ward of New York, Wilkin, Thomas Wilson, and William Wilson.

The residue of the said amendments were then read, and concurred in by the House.

FRIDAY, April 26.

The bill to allow a drawback of duties on spirits distilled and sugar refined within the United States, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to a third reading.

The bill to carry into effect the treaty with the Cherokee Indians; the bill for settling the compensation of the commissioners, &c., of land claims in Louisiana; the bill for adjustment of certain land claims in Louisiana, &c.; and the bill for the relief of Manasseh Minor; successively passed through a Committee of the Whole, and were severally ordered to a third reading.

The bill fixing the peace establishment of the Marine Corps was indefinitely postponed, on motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, who remarked, that it had been ascertained that the Secretary of the Navy had already placed the corps on the establishment contemplated by the bill; and further, that it was believed the corps might be made still more efficient than as it was at present constituted, if organized differently from what was contemplated by the bill.

The bill respecting the patent rights of the representatives of Robert Fulton, deceased, was also, on motion of Mr. CULPEPER, indefinitely postponed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of this House of the following titles, to wit:

An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States; an act authorizing the Judges of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia to prepare a code of jurisprudence for the said District; an act concerning the owners, officers, and crew of the privateer Roger; an act making an appropriation for enclosing and improving the public square near the Capitol, and to abolish the office of Commissioners of the Public Buildings, and of Superintendent, and for the appointment of one Commissioner for the Public Buildings; an act for the relief of Peter Audrain; an act for the relief of David Coffin, Samuel and William Rodman, and Samuel Rodman, jun.; an act for the confirmation of certain claims to land in the Western district in the State of Louisiana; an act to provide for the appointment of a surveyor of the public lands in the Territories of Illinois and Missouri; an act to establish post roads; an act fixing the compensation of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and making a temporary provision for the clerks employed in their offices, with amendments. The Senate have also passed the resolution "to indemnify Jabez Mowry, and others," with amendments; and they have passed the bill "to increase the salary of the Register of the Treasury, and to allow him a compensation for his agency in countersigning and issuing Treasury notes;" and a resolution, "authorizing the President of the United States to employ a skilful assistant in the Corps of Engineers;" in all of which amendments, together with the said last mentioned bill and resolution, they ask the concurrence of this House.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to increase the compensation of the Superintendents of the manufactories of arms at Springfield and Harper's Ferry." The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time to-day.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to the several acts organizing the office of Accountant of the Department of War; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with amendments; which were concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill from this House, entitled "An act for the relief of William Crawford, Frederick Bates, and William Garrard;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported their concurrence in the said amendments; which were concurred in by the House.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill from this House, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year 1816;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported their concurrence in the said amendment; which was concurred in by the House.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. WEBSTER rose, and submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, all duties, taxes, imposts, and excises, laid or imposed by Government, ought, by the provisions of the Constitution, to be uniform throughout the United States; and that no preference ought to be given or allowed by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another.

And resolved further, That the revenues of the United States ought to be collected and received in the legal currency of the United States, or in Treasury notes, or in the notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared.

And resolved further, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary, to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States as aforesaid; and that from and after the 1st day of February next no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as aforesaid.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that he had felt it to be his duty to call the attention of the House once more to the subject of the collection of the revenue, and to present the resolutions which had been submitted. He had been the more inclined to do this from an apprehension that the rejection, yesterday, of the bill which had been introduced, might be construed into an abandonment, on the part of the House, of all hope of remedying the existing evil. He had had, it was true, some objections against proceeding by way of bill; because the case was not one in which the law was deficient, but one in which the execution of the law was deficient. The great object, however, was to obtain a decision of this and the other House, that the present mode of receiving the revenue should not be continued, and as this might be substantially effected by the bill, he had hoped that it might pass. This hope had been disappointed. The bill had been rejected. The House had put its negative upon the only proposition which had been submitted to it, for correcting a state of things, which everybody knows to exist, in plain violation of the Constitution, and in open defiance of the written letter of the law. For one, he could never consent to adjourn, leaving this implied sanction of the House upon all that had taken place, and all that might hereafter take place. He hoped not to hear again that there was not now time to act on this question. If other gentlemen considered the question as important as he did, they would not forbear to act upon it from any desire, however strong, to bring the session to an early close.

The situation of the country, said Mr. W., in regard to the collection of its revenues, is most deplorable. With a perfectly sound legal currency, the national revenues are not collected in this currency, but in paper of various sorts, and various degrees of value. The origin and progress of this evil are distinctly known, but it is not easy to see its duration or its future extent, if an adequate remedy be not soon found. Before the war, the business of the country was conducted principally by means of the paper of the different State banks. As these were in good credit, and paid their notes in gold and silver on demand, no great evil was experienced from the circulation of their paper. Not being, however, a part of the legal money of the country, it could not, by law, be received in the payment of duties, taxes or other debts to Government. But being payable, and hitherto regularly paid, on demand, the collectors and agents of Government had generally received it as cash; it had been deposited as cash in the banks which received the deposits of Government, and from them it had been drawn as cash, and paid off to creditors of the public.

During the war, this state of things changed. Many of the banks had been induced to make loans to a very great amount to Government. These loans were made by an issue of their own bills. This proceeding threw into circulation an immense quantity of bank paper, in no degree corresponding with the mercantile business of the country, and resting on nothing for its payment and redemption but the Government stocks, which were held by the banks. The consequence immediately followed, which it would be imputing a great degree of blindness both to the Government and to the banks to suggest that they had not foreseen. The excess of paper which was found everywhere, created alarm. Demands began to be made on the banks, and they all stopped payment. No contrivance to get money, without inconvenience to the people, ever had a shorter course of experiment, or a more unequivocal termination. The depreciation of bank notes was the necessary consequence of a neglect or refusal on the part of those who issued them to pay them. It took place immediately, and has continued, with occasional fluctuation in the degree of depression, to the present moment. What still further increases the evil is, that this bank paper being the issue of very many different institutions, situated in different parts of the country, and possessing different degrees of credit, the depreciation has not been, and is not now, uniform throughout the United States. It is not the same at Baltimore as at Philadelphia; nor the same at Philadelphia as at New York. In New-England the banks have not stopped payment in specie, and of course their paper has not been depressed at all. But the notes of banks which have ceased to pay specie, have, nevertheless, been, and still are, received for duties and taxes, in the places where such banks exist. The consequence of all this is, that the people of the United States pay their duties and taxes in currencies of different values in different places. In other words, taxes and duties are higher in some places than they are in others, by as much as the value of gold and silver is greater than the value of the several descriptions of bank paper which are received by Government. This difference, in relation to the paper of the District in which we now are, is twenty-five per cent.; taxes and duties, therefore, collected in Massachusetts, are one quarter higher than the taxes and duties which are collected, by virtue of the same laws, in the District of Columbia.

By the Constitution of the Government, it is certain that all duties, taxes, and excises, ought to be uniform throughout the United States; and that no preference should be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another. This Constitutional provision, it is obvious, is flagrantly violated. Duties and taxes are not uniform. They are higher in some places than in others. A citizen of New England pays his tax in gold and silver, or their equivalent. From his hand the collector will not receive, and is instructed by Government not to receive, the notes of the banks which do not pay their notes on demand, and which notes he could obtain twenty or twenty-five per cent. cheaper than that which is demanded of him. Yet a citizen of the Middle States pays his taxes in these notes at par. Can a greater injustice than this be conceived? Can Constitutional provisions be disregarded in a more essential point? Commercial preferences also are given, which, if they could be continued, would be sufficient to annihilate the commerce of some cities and some States, while they would extremely promote the others. The importing merchant at Boston pays the duties upon his goods, either in specie or cash notes, which are at least twenty per cent. or in Treasury notes, which are ten per cent. more valuable than the notes which are paid for duties, at par, by the importing merchant at Baltimore. Surely this is not to be endured. Such monstrous inequality and injustice are not to be tolerated. Since the commencement of this course of things, it can be shown, that the people of the Northern States have paid a million of dollars more than their just proportion of the public burdens. A similar inequality, though somewhat less in degree, has fallen upon the States south of the Potomac, in which the paper in circulation, although not equivalent to specie, is yet of higher value than the bank notes of this District, Maryland, and the Middle States.

But it is not merely the inequality and injustice of this system, if system it may be called—if not rather the want of all system—which call for reform. It throws the whole revenue into derangement, and endless confusion. It prevents the possibility of order, method, or certainty, in the public receipts or disbursements. This mass of depressed paper, thrown out at first in loans to accommodate Government, has done little less than to embarrass and distress Government. It can hardly be said to circulate, but it lies in the channel of circulation, and chokes it up by its bulk and its sluggishness. In a great portion of the country, the dues to Government are not paid, or are paid badly; and in an equal portion of the country the public creditors are not paid, or are paid badly.

It is quite clear, that, by the statute, all duties and taxes are required to be paid in the legal money of the United States, or in Treasury notes, agreeably to recent provisions. It is just as clear, that the law has been disregarded, and that the notes of banks of an hundred different descriptions, and almost as many different values, have been received, and still are received where the statute requires legal money or Treasury notes to be paid.

In these circumstances, I cannot persuade myself that Congress will adjourn without attempting something by way of remedy. In my opinion, no greater evil has threatened us. Nothing can more endanger, either the existence and preservation of the public revenue, or the security of private property, than the consequences which are to be apprehended from the present course of things, if they be not arrested by a timely and an effectual interference. Let gentlemen consider what will probably happen, if Congress should rise without the adoption of any measure on the subject.

Virginia, having passed a law for compelling the banks in that State to limit the circulation of their paper and resume specie payments by the Autumn, will, doubtless, repeal it. The States further to the South will probably fall into a similar relaxation, for it is hardly to be expected that they will have firmness and perseverance enough to persist in their present most prudent and commendable course, without the countenance of the General Government.

If, in addition to these events, an abandonment of the wholesome system which has thus far prevailed in the Northern States, or any relaxation of that system, should take place, the Government is in danger of falling into a condition from which it can hardly be expected to extricate itself for twenty years, if indeed it shall ever be able to extricate itself, and if that state of things, instead of being changed by the Government, shall not change the Government.

It is our business to foresee this danger, and to avoid it. There are some political evils which are seen as soon as they are dangerous, and which alarm at once as well the people as the Government. Wars and invasions, therefore, are not always the most certain destroyers of national prosperity. They come in no questionable shape. They announce their own approach, and the general safety is preserved by the general alarm. Not so with the evils of a debased coin, a depreciated paper currency, or a depressed and falling public credit. No so with the plausible and insidious mischief of a paper money system. These insinuate themselves in the shape of facilities, accommodation, and relief. They hold out the most fallacious hope of an easier payment of debts, and a lighter burden of taxation. It is easy for a portion of the people to imagine that Government may properly continue to receive depreciated paper, because they have received it, and because it is more convenient to obtain it than to obtain other paper, or specie. But on these subjects it is, that Government ought to exercise its own peculiar wisdom and caution. It is supposed to possess, on subjects of this nature, somewhat more of foresight than has fallen to the lot of individuals. It is bound to foresee the evil before every man feels it, and to take all necessary measures to guard against it, although they may be measures attended with some difficulty and not without temporary inconvenience. In my humble judgment the evil demands the immediate attention of Congress. It is not certain, and in my opinion not probable, that it will ever cure itself. It is more likely to grow by indulgence, while the remedy which must in the end be applied, will become less efficacious by delay.

The only power which the General Government possesses of restraining the issues of the State banks, is to refuse their notes in the receipts of the Treasury. This power it can exercise now, or at least it can provide now for exercising in reasonable time, because the currency of some part of the country is yet sound, and the evil is not universal. If it should become universal, who, that hesitates now, will then propose any adequate means of relief? If a measure, like the bill of yesterday, or the resolutions of to-day, can hardly pass here now, what hope is there that any efficient measure will be adopted hereafter?

The conduct of the Treasury Department in receiving the notes of the banks, after they had suspended payment, might or might not have been excused by the necessity of the case. That is not now the subject of inquiry. I wish such inquiry had been instituted. It ought to have been; it is of dangerous consequence to permit plain omissions to execute the law to pass off, under any circumstances, without inquiry. It would probably be easier to prove that the Treasury must have continued to receive such notes, or that all payments to Government would have been suspended, than it would be to justify the previous negotiation of great loans at the banks, which was a voluntary transaction, induced by no particular necessity, and which is nevertheless, beyond doubt, the principal cause of their present condition. But I have expressed my belief on more than one occasion, and I now repeat the opinion, that it was the duty, and in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the return of peace, to have returned to the legal and proper mode of collecting the revenue. The paper of the banks rose, on that occasion, almost to an equality with specie; that was the favorable moment. The banks in which the public money was deposited ought to have been induced to lead the way, by the sale of their Government stocks, and other measures calculated to bring about, moderately and gradually, but regularly and certainly, a restoration of the former and only safe state of things. It can hardly be doubted, that the influence of the Treasury could have effected all this. If not, it could have withdrawn the deposits and the countenance of Government from institutions, which, against all rule and propriety, were holding great sums in Government stocks, and making enormous profits from the circulation of their own dishonored paper. That which was most wanted, was the designation of a time, for the corresponding operation of banks in different places. This could have been made by the Head of the Treasury, better than by anybody or everybody else. But the occasion was suffered to pass by unimproved, and the credit of the banks soon fell again, when it was found they used none of the means which the opportunity gave themselves for enabling them to fulfil their engagements.

As to any power of compulsion to be exercised over the State banks, they are not subject to the direct control of the General Government. It is for the State authorities which created them to decide, whether they have acted according to their charters, and, if not, what shall be the remedy for their irregularities. But, from such of them as continued to receive the deposit of public money, Government had a right to expect that they would conduct their concerns according to the safe and well known principles which should properly govern such institutions. And this Government has in all cases a right to protect its own revenues, and to guard them against defalcation by bad or depreciated paper. It is bound also to collect its taxes of the people on a uniform system. These rights and these duties are too important to be surrendered to the accommodation of any particular interest or temporary purpose.

The resolutions before the House take no notice of the State banks. They express neither praise nor censure of them. They neither commend them for their patriotism in the loans made to Government, nor propose to tax them for their neglect or refusal to pay their debts. They assume no power of interfering with these institutions. They say not one word about compelling them to resume their payments; they leave that to the consideration of the banks themselves, or of those who have a right to call them to account for any misconduct in that respect. But the resolutions declare that taxes ought to be equal; that preferences ought not to be given; that the revenues of the country ought not to be diminished in amount, nor hazarded altogether by the receipt of varying and uncertain paper; and that the present state of things, in which all these unconstitutional, illegal, and dangerous ingredients are mixed, ought not to exist.

It has been said that these resolutions may be construed into a justification of the past conduct of the Treasury Department. Such an objection has been anticipated. It was made, in my opinion, with much more justice to the bill rejected yesterday, and a provision was accordingly subsequently introduced into that bill to exclude such an inference. This is certainly not the time to express any justification or approbation of the conduct of that Department on this subject, and I trust these resolutions do not imply it. Nor do the resolutions propose to express any censure. A sufficient reason for declining to do either is, that the facts are not sufficiently known. What loss has actually happened, what amount (it is said to be large) may be now in the Treasury, in notes which will not now pass, or under what circumstances these were received, is not now sufficiently ascertained.

But before these resolutions are rejected, on the ground that they may shield the Treasury Department from responsibility, it ought to be clearly shown that they are capable of receiving such a construction. The mere passing of any resolution cannot have that effect. A declaration of what ought to be done, does not necessarily imply any sanction of what has been done. It may sometimes imply the contrary. These resolutions cannot be made to imply any more than this, that the financial affairs of the country are in such a condition that the revenue cannot be instantly collected in legal currency. This they do imply, and this I suppose almost all admit to be true. An instantaneous execution of the law, without warning or notice, could, in my opinion, produce nothing, in a portion of the country, but an entire suspension of payments.

But to whose fault it is owing that the affairs of the country are reduced to this condition, they do not declare. They do not prevent, or in any degree embarrass, future inquiry on that subject. They speak to the fact, that the finances are deranged. They say also that reformation, though it must be gradual, ought to be immediately begun, and to be carried to perfection in the shortest time practicable. They cannot, by any fair construction, be made to express the approbation of Congress on the past conduct of any high officer of Government; and if the time shall ever come, when this House shall deem investigation necessary, it must be a case of very unpromising aspect, and of most fearful issue, which shall afford no other hope of escape than by setting up these resolutions by way of bar to an inquiry.

Nor is it any objection to this measure that inquiry has not first been had. Two duties may be supposed to have rested on the House: the one, to inquire into the origin of the evil, if it needed inquiry, and the other to find and apply a remedy. Because one of these duties has not hitherto been discharged, is no reason why the other should be longer neglected. While we are deciding which to do first, the time of the session is going by us, and neither may be done. In the mean time public mischiefs, of unknown magnitude and incalculable duration, threaten the country. I see no equivalent, no consolation, no mitigation, for these evils, in the future responsibility of departments. Let gentlemen show me any responsibility which will not be a name and a mockery. If, when we meet here again, it shall be found that all the barriers which have hitherto, in any degree, restrained the emissions of a mere paper money of the worst sort have given way, and that the floods have broken in upon us and come over us; if it shall be found that the revenues have failed—that the public credit, now a little propped and supported by a state of peace and commerce, has again tottered and fallen to the ground, and that all the operations of Government are at a stand, what then will be the value of the responsibility of departments? How great then the value of inquiry, when the evil is past prevention—when officers may have gone out of place, and when, indeed, the whole Administration will necessarily be dissolving, by the expiration of the term for which the Chief Executive Magistrate was chosen!

I cannot consent to take the chance of the greatest public mischiefs upon a reliance on any such responsibility. The stakes are too unequal.

As to the opinion advanced by some, that the object of the resolution cannot, in any way, be answered—that the revenues cannot be collected, otherwise than as they are now, in the paper of any and every banking association which chooses to issue paper, it cannot for a moment be admitted. This would be at once giving up the Government; for what is Government without revenue, and what is a revenue that is gathered together in the varying, fluctuating, discredited, depreciated, and still falling promissory notes of two or three hundred distinct, and, as to this Government, irresponsible banking companies? If it cannot collect its revenues in a better manner than this, it must cease to be a Government. The thing therefore is to be done; at any rate it is to be attempted. That it will be accomplished by the Treasury Department, without the interference of Congress, I have no belief. If from that source no reformation came, when reformation was easy, it is not now to be expected. Especially after the vote of yesterday, those whose interest it is to continue the present state of things, will arm themselves with the authority of Congress. They will justify themselves by the decision of this House. They will say, and say truly, that this House, having taken up the subject and discussed it, has not thought fit so much as to declare that it is expedient ever to relieve the country or its revenues from a paper money system. Whoever believes that the Treasury Department will oppose this tide, aided, as it will be, by strong feeling and great interest, has more faith in that Department than has fallen to my lot. It is the duty of this House to interfere with its own authority. Having taxed the people with no light hand, it is now its duty to take care that the people do not sustain these burdens in vain. The taxes are not borne without feeling. They will not be borne without complaint, if, by mismanagement in collection, their utility to Government should be lost, and they should get into the Treasury at last only in discredited and useless paper.

A bank of thirty-five millions has been created for the professed purpose of correcting the evils of our circulation, and facilitating the receipts and expenditures of Government. I am not so sanguine in the hope of great benefit from this measure as others are. But the Treasury is also authorized to issue twenty-five millions of Treasury notes, eighteen or twenty millions of which remain yet to be issued, and which are also allowed by law to be received for duties and taxes. In addition to these is the coin which is in the country, and which is sure to come forth into circulation whenever there is a demand for it. These means, if wisely and skilfully administered, are sufficient to prevent any particular pressure or great inconvenience, in returning to the legal mode of collecting the revenue. It is true it may be easier for the people in the States in which a depreciated paper exists to pay their taxes in such paper, than in the legal currency or Treasury notes, because they can get it cheaper. But this is only saying that it is easier to pay a small tax than to pay a larger one, or that money costs more than that which is less valuable than money: a proposition not to be disputed. But a medium of payment, convenient for the people and safe for the Government, will be furnished, and may everywhere be obtained for a reasonable price. This is all that can justly be expected of Congress. Having provided this, they ought to require all parts of the country to conform to the same measure of justice. If taxes be not necessary, they should not be laid. If laid, they ought to be collected without preference or partiality.

But while some gentlemen oppose the resolutions because they fix a day too near, others think they fix a day too distant. In my own judgment, it is not so material what the time is, as it is to fix a time. The great object is to settle the question, that our legal currency is to be preserved, and that we are not about to embark on the ocean of paper money. The State banks, if they consult their own interest, or the interest of the community, will dispose of their Government stocks, and prepare themselves to redeem their paper and fulfil their contracts. If they should not adopt this course, there will be time for the people to be informed that the paper of such institutions will not answer the demands of Government, and that duties and taxes must be paid in the manner provided by law.

I cannot say, indeed, that this measure will certainly produce the desired end. It may fail. Its success, as is obvious, must essentially depend on the course pursued by the Treasury Department. But its tendency, I think, must be to produce good. It will, I hope, be a proof that Congress is not regardless of its duty. It will be evidence that this great subject has not passed without notice. It will record our determination to resist the introduction of a most destructive and miserable policy into our system, and if there be any sanction or authority in the Constitution and the law; if there be any regard for justice and equality; if there be any care for the national revenue, or any concern for the public interest, let gentlemen consider whether they will relinquish their seats here, before this or some other measure be adopted.

When Mr. W. had concluded, Mr. LEWIS moved that the resolutions be indefinitely postponed.

A debate of much length and no little warmth followed, occupying, in a great degree, the ground taken on the bill on the same subject, which was yesterday rejected—the friends of the resolutions urging the necessity of some legislative act in a matter so deeply interesting to the public weal; the alarming consequences which might and probably would follow from adjourning, without doing something on the subject; and the fact that there was a majority yesterday in favor of the bill, but accidentally absent when the question was decided: and the opponents of the measure protesting against it, as well from its objectionable nature as against attempting it, when there were so few members remaining; and after the question had been decided by the House, in the rejection of the bill yesterday. The gentlemen who spoke against postponement, and in favor of the resolutions, were Messrs. CALHOUN, GROSVENOR, ALEXANDER, MOSELEY, PICKERING, LYON, CULPEPER, GOLDSBOROUGH, HARDIN, and SHEFFEY; those who opposed the resolutions were Messrs. LEWIS, SMITH, of Maryland, and WRIGHT.

At the close of the debate, Mr. LEWIS withdrew his motion for postponement.

Mr. WEBSTER, after observing that it was in compliance with the wishes of gentlemen friendly to the general object of the resolutions, but averse to the adoption of the two first, withdrew those two.

Mr. CALHOUN proposed to amend the remaining resolution by extending its provisions to the notes of all banks which should, at the time specified therein, pay their notes in specie on demand.

Mr. WEBSTER saw no necessity for this amendment, and it would be better, he thought, to leave it for a Treasury regulation. It might happen that a bank, pretending to pay specie, might send its notes to a great distance, where, if they were offered in payment, it would be impossible to ascertain whether they were redeemable with specie or not.

Mr. CALHOUN agreed that it was not necessary, because the Treasury had already exercised the power, and it might very well be left with the Secretary still; but he had offered the amendment to meet the wishes of other gentlemen. As, however, it was objected to, he would not press it, and therefore withdrew it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to strike out the "first of February," and insert the "first of March." Negatived—ayes 52, noes 53.

Mr. PICKENS, after some introductory remarks, offered the following amendment:

"All banks and banking institutions, whose notes may have been received in the collection of taxes or other dues in behalf of the United States to pay the same notes in gold or silver, or in Treasury notes of the Bank of the United States."

The amendment was opposed by Messrs. EDWARDS, CALHOUN, and MILNOR, and supported at some length by Mr. PICKENS, and negatived by a large majority.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN, who remarked that a few days would be of much importance to the banks in preparing for the payment of their notes, the "twentieth" was inserted, instead of the first of February.

Mr. WRIGHT moved the following clause after the word "declared," in the eleventh line of the third resolution:

"Or any notes of any banks which have been or which shall hereafter be paid by the United States for any debt due, or demand by the said United States."

Mr. EDWARDS had no objection to the amendment, if the mover would designate the mode by which the notes paid away by the Government could be identified. Without that, the amendment would be useless.

Mr. WRIGHT replied, that it would be very easy to ascertain the notes so paid by marking them in a way to be identified, and that that difficulty could be readily obviated. He asked for the yeas and nays on the question, which were refused; and the amendment was rejected almost unanimously.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH then moved to insert the following words after the word "necessary," in the fourth line of the third resolution, so as to read

"Such measures as he may deem necessary, to pay all claims against the United States in legal money, or such Treasury notes as may hereafter be acceptable to the parties having such claims against the United States."

This motion produced a good deal of discussion, in which Messrs. INGHAM, PITKIN, CADY, and WEBSTER, opposed the amendment; and Messrs. GOLDSBOROUGH and WRIGHT advocated it. Mr. W. demanded the yeas and nays on the question, which were again refused; and the amendment was negatived without a division.

The question on ordering the resolution to be engrossed and read a third time, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 35, as follows:

VACCINATION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to an act to encourage vaccination.

Mr. CONNOR introduced an amendment, enjoining it as a duty on the Secretaries of the War and Navy Departments, to cause all the soldiers and seamen forthwith to be vaccinated, who should not furnish proof of having had small pox, or the vaccine disease. In support of this motion, Mr. C. stated, that the small pox broke out among the crew of the Guerriere at Naples; twelve had the disease, four of whom died. During the same cruise, a case of small pox occurred on board the Congress frigate on the 9th of October, 1815, the infection having probably been received at Malaga, which place the ship left the 25th September. The crew was mustered on the 17th and eighty-five persons inoculated, of whom sixty-seven had the disease. From these facts, Mr. C. presumed the House would see the utility of the proposed amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; as well as one offered also by Mr. C. to extend the duration of the act to seven instead of three years.

The amendments were reported to the House; when Mr. HARDIN moved the indefinite postponement of the bill. After some debate, this motion was negatived by a large majority; and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, April 29.

Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from a further consideration of the several subjects to them referred, and upon which they have not reported.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. ROBERTSON, on the 27th instant, proposing an amendment to the standing rules and orders of the House, which being again read, was amended, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That at the commencement of each future session of Congress, a standing committee be appointed, consisting of five members, to be denominated "the Committee on Private Land Claims," whose duty it shall be to take into consideration all claims to land, which may be referred to them, or shall, or may come in question, and to report their opinion thereupon, together with such propositions for relief therein, as to them shall seem expedient.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS WILSON,

Ordered, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be discharged from a further consideration of the letter and documents of General William Henry Harrison, and that the same, together with the communications and documents presented to the committee, on the same subject, be referred to the Secretary of War, and that he be instructed to report thereon to this House at their next session.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House "to allow drawback of duties on spirits distilled and sugar refined within the United States," with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House. The Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of the Chaplains of Congress," in which bill they ask the concurrence of this House. And they insist upon their first and third amendments to the bill from this House, fixing the compensation of the Secretary of the Senate, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and making a temporary provision for the clerks employed in their offices, with the amendment recommended by the Managers at the conference on that subject.

Mr. HARDIN, from the Managers at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, upon the bill fixing the compensation of the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and making a temporary provision for the clerks employed in their offices, reported that the conferees recommended—"That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the first and third amendments, and that the bill be further amended by inserting after the word 'effect,' in the last line thereof, the following words: 'And continue in force for two years.'"

H. OF R.

The House then proceeded to consider the said report and amendment; whereupon,

Resolved, That this House recede from their disagreement to the said first and third amendments, with the amendment to the bill recommended by the conferees.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill "to allow drawback of duties on spirits distilled and sugar refined within the United States," was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

The bill from the Senate "fixing the compensation of the Chaplains of Congress," was read the first and second time, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole to whom is committed the bill for the relief of John H. Peaslee, Nathan B. Haswell, and Russell Jones; and the bill from the Senate "concerning the library of Congress, be discharged from a further consideration thereof, and that the said bills be postponed indefinitely.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the President of the United States, communicating certain information called for respecting the number of American prisoners at Dartmoor, which had been impressed, &c.; which, with the documents, was ordered to be printed.

The bill supplementary to the act to encourage vaccination, which was under consideration at the time of adjournment on Saturday, was taken up.

A motion was made that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The postponement was supported by Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. PICKERING on various grounds, unconnected with any view of obstructing the dissemination of the vaccine matter; the want of time to deliberate on the provisions of the bill; the doubt whether Congress could constitutionally appropriate money for such purposes, &c. The postponement was opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT and CONDUCT, who replied to the gentlemen above named; after which the motion was agreed to, and the bill indefinitely postponed—ayes 49, noes 48.

The bill to increase the salary of the Register of the Treasury, [from $2,400 to $3,000,] and to compensate him for signing Treasury notes, passed through a Committee of the whole House, in which the allowance for signing Treasury notes, was, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, stricken out. The House concurred in the amendment, and ordered the bill to a third reading; which was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendment proposed by the Senate "to the bill for the relief of Peter Audrain;" and after some time spent therein, the Committee reported their agreement to the said amendment.—The amendment was then concurred in by the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill "to allow drawback of duties on spirits distilled and sugar refined within the United States;" and on the bill from the Senate "fixing the compensation of the Chaplains of Congress;" and after some time spent therein, the Committee reported their agreement to the said amendment, as also the said bill without amendment.—The amendment was then concurred in by the House.

Ordered, That the bill "fixing the compensation of the Chaplains of Congress," be read a third time to-day. The bill was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House to whom is committed the bills from the Senate, "for the relief Jacob Babbitt and John Dennis," and "providing for the publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States;" the bill "for the relief of Isaac Lawrence and others, merchants of New York;" and the report of the select committee respecting the remains of the late General George WASHINGTON, be discharged from a further consideration thereof, and that the said bills and report be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PICKERING submitted the following proposition of amendment to the standing rules and orders of the House; which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules and orders of the House:

1. All standing committees, except the Committee of Ways and Means, shall consist each of five members, and no member shall be put on more than one standing committee at the same time.

2. Of the journals of the House printed from day to day while Congress is in session, ten copies only shall be delivered in sheets, and these shall be in the custody of the Clerk.

3. Daily, while the House is in session, the post office attached to it shall be and continue shut.

POST OFFICE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. CULPEPER, after expressing his desire that the House would go into consideration of the subject, and pronounce some opinion upon it, moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of the report of the committee of investigation into the fiscal affairs of the General Post Office, that the same might be brought at once before the House.

Mr. ROOR suggested the propriety of referring the subject to the President of the United States, who would investigate the report, the evidence, &c., and do justice to the parties concerned.

Mr. CULPEPER opposed this course. The Postmaster General had asked of the House the investigation, which had in part been acted on, and it was the duty of the House to prosecute the inquiry. It was his misfortune to know a great deal of this affair, and he wished it taken up in this House, that it might be amply developed and fully acted on.

Mr. McKEE made a few remarks on the propriety of taking up the subject, unconnected with the merits of the case. He adverted to a fact which had come to his knowledge—the dismissal of some of the clerks from the Post Office; and he should be glad to learn whether that had been done in consequence of any facts they had disclosed, or whether it appeared to the committee that those men possessed any evidence which their dismissal might be intended to prevent.

Mr. WRIGHT.—Mr. Speaker, I am not a little surprised at the present effort of the honorable gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. CULPEPER) to bring up the report of the committee on the General Post Office, after the honorable chairman of that committee has gone home with leave, and a week after this House has sent their resolution to the Senate to adjourn—especially when it is a fact of notoriety, that the honorable chairman of that committee had made several abortive efforts to take up that report. There must be some secret spring to this untimely attempt to take up a subject of so much moment. Mr. Speaker, the manner that this subject was brought before this House, so highly honorable to the head of that Department, tests the feelings of that highly honorable officer, that the character of that office should not only be pure, but unsuspected. He therefore sought the investigation, which has eventuated in the report of the committee of the evidence of the facts, which will show that they were not of an order to induce an unkind suspicion of any impurity in any of the officers in the establishment, unless in the malcontents, who, by their indirections and false clamors, have evinced a disposition to undermine their superiors, and thereby gain a grade for themselves—but who, by this timely inquiry, have been disappointed, and, for their false clamor, have been themselves removed. I heard with pleasure the remarks of the honorable Messrs. CREIGHTON, PICKERING, and FORNEY, members of the committee, going all lengths to testify their sense of the correct conduct of the officers complained of. They charge Mr. Bradley with being a contractor to carry the mail by a contract with the Postmaster General, Mr. Granger, although Mr. Bradley declined such a copartnership, but by the express approbation of Mr. Granger. They charge that, after that contract was closed, the compensation was greatly increased by an additional article, but on inquiry it is found that the same additional article of compensation contained an extension of the route beyond the additional compensation. They charge, also, that Mr. Bradley caused the moneys paid into the Post Office, to be deposited in a bank, to which he had been chosen president. Sir, the honorable selection of that gentleman to be the president of a bank, is strong evidence of the integrity of his character; and, sir, if the money of the public were necessarily to be deposited in some bank for safe-keeping, and for the facility of disbursement, can any man be of opinion that they would not be as safe there, under the double responsibility of the officer who was to direct the deposits, as well as the disbursements? And, sir, if any profit could arise to the officer at the head of the bank, can it be an objection with any honorable man, that he should be excluded from that benefit, because he was high in the confidence of the nation, where, it is well known, he had long been a perfect drudger? And, sir, it is well known that the Post Office deposits were always made in that bank, and long before the selection of Mr. Bradley to be the president—and would any man feel disposed to remove the deposits, because Mr. Bradley was put at the head of that bank?

Mr. GROSVENOR thought, if the Postmaster General, after asking the investigation, had discharged clerks with a view to prevent the remainder of the clerks from giving testimony, it was a high contempt of this House, and deserved its severe animadversion. He did not know such was the fact—he had no evidence of it but common report.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, that this was a subject in the estimation of the member from North Carolina (Mr. CULPEPER) sufficiently important to arrest all other business before the House. It is a little astonishing, said Mr. J., that a member, impressed with this importance, and which he would not deny, should make such a motion one day only previous to the close of the session, when the House had before it a great number of bills, which it was indispensable to be acted upon; not only this, but to make the motion the day the chairman had left Congress, and not the chairman only, but other members—one from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) who was anxious to have the subject before the House, but which the House, on several occasions, had refused, or neglected if you will, to take into consideration. Mr. J. said, he was equally anxious that the subject should be investigated; yes, thoroughly investigated; for he never had been placed in a situation where he was afraid to accuse or acquit any person, if it became his duty to do so. To meet the wishes of the gentleman from North Carolina, he said, he would vote to rescind the joint resolution of adjournment, if the proposition was made; for no member could believe that justice could be done to either party, in so short a time, if the subject was so important. Mr. J. said, that he was very glad to find that the honorable mover knew so much. Did he know more than the committee of investigation? If so, how? Did the committee refuse testimony, or did they suppress any important fact? Mr. J. wished to ask each member of the committee on this subject, and he wanted to know if the committee agreed to the report unanimously, or was the committee divided? These were inquiries he should make; and if the member from North Carolina knew more than the committee, he would inquire from what source he obtained his information, and why such information was withheld from the committee? But at this time these inquiries could not be made of all the committee, because one-half had left the city.

If this matter was not brought forward, whose fault was it? It was in the power of any member to make a motion at any time, that would have involved the discussion of the merits of the report. Those very members were to blame, who were dissatisfied with the course the chairman pursued in calling up the report, when the Speaker read the order of the day on that subject; for to his knowledge the chairman had called it twice, and on neither occasion would the House take up the subject—and he presumed because the more pressing concerns of the nation were before the House. If that was the reason, or whatever reason, it is impossible, said Mr. J., that justice can be done to the parties concerned, at this time; nor could members express their sentiments, which he was desirous to do, at the close of the session. This view alone would prevent him from voting to take up the subject now. Some observations had been made in relation to three of the clerks being dismissed. Mr. J. said, if the necessity existed for such dismissal, he regretted that necessity. If they were dismissed without necessity, he would still more regret the circumstance, because, deserved or not, the dismissed clerks would, no doubt, feel it in relation to their avocations. But, Mr. J. said, who was the judge on this occasion? Who had the power of appointing clerks in the various Executive offices, from the foundation of the Government? Was it Congress, or the Heads of Departments? Would it be proper for Congress to appoint the various clerks? If so, they would then have the right to dismiss. Have we ever had an inquiry into the causes of the dismissal of any officer of the Government by the Executive, or the dismissal of any clerk by the Head of a Department? He believed no such case could be adduced; of course, Mr. J. said, whether he considered these clerks worthy of confidence or not, he was not the judge of their continuance in employment; it was the Postmaster General. But, say gentlemen, shall clerks be turned out for giving evidence in an inquiry into the conduct of the Department to which they belong? Mr. J. said no, they should not be turned out for speaking the truth—but if they made false accusations, it was with the Head of the Department to judge of their conduct, and retain them or dismiss them, as he thought proper. In saying this, Mr. J. did not intend to give any opinion on the case, because the Speaker considered it out of order; but he wanted that opportunity, whenever time would admit—nor did he wish to say anything to injure the dismissed clerks. He did not know them; he wished their condition could have been otherwise—he had no feeling of hostility to them. But it had been said that these clerks had been dismissed while the investigation was progressing, and because they had made the accusations. Mr. J. said, the fact was otherwise, as to the pendency of the investigation. It was a fact that the investigation was closed previously to their dismissal; after their dismissal he understood the clerks were indignant, and requested to be brought before the committee again; they were brought forward, and also had access to the Post Office books, and the use of other witnesses, and he understood that the additional testimony had been taken and reported by the committee, and was now before the House.

In relation to the dismissal of clerks, this was the principle the House would adopt, that is to say—the House would inquire whether any imposition had been practised to make them conceal or suppress the truth. If a bribe, or any reward should be offered to a clerk, or any other witness, to conceal the truth, or suggest a falsehood, such act being proven, would be sufficient to consign such officers to infamy and to dismissal; or the fact that a clerk was threatened with dismissal, if he told the truth—such a charge, from respectable authority, would demand examination. He should vote for a standing committee in the recess, or during the session, either, to make inquiries; but no such fact had been proven, and no such suggestion had been made.

It had been stated that the clerks told the committee that they understood they were to be dismissed, and when dismissed that it had been on account of giving evidence, but it could not be on account of any fact to which they made oath; because, with all their testimony, they had proved nothing that they stated they could prove. So says the report; and now we ask if the committee suppressed any fact? If not, then no charge has been proven. Mr. J. said, that while he would at every hazard maintain his independence as a representative, he would as obstinately oppose any interference with Executive duties. Indeed, said Mr. J., the dismissal of the clerks was the very course to make them prove everything that could be proven; and we see, from the statements of members of the committee, that it had the effect of a request on the part of the dismissed clerks to be heard again; they were heard again as to the investigation—therefore, the dismissal could not have been with a view to prevent them from giving all the information in their power; and with all that additional incentive not one charge had been proven, unless a committee of seven members have been wanting in their duty. Nor had he heard a suggestion from any of the committee, that any of the charges had been proven. There was one subject upon which he also wished to express his views—as to the deposits of the Post Office, and the regulation of its fiscal concerns. But that was not now in order, and he should say no more.

Mr. PICKERING said, the gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) considered the removal of those clerks of the General Post Office who had appeared as accusers in relation to the conduct of that Department, while that conduct was under investigation by the orders of this House, as a contempt of the House. On the fact assumed by the gentleman, his observation must be admitted to be correct. But before their removal those clerks had been themselves examined, and the committee had for a long time and very patiently listened to the statements, and summoned before them every person within their reach whom the clerks or any of them represented as able to give any testimony in support of the suggestions. Towards the close of the investigation, those clerks discovered no abatement of zeal, in hunting for persons who had exchanged any bank notes with the persons accused. But most or all of these cases occurred prior to the difference in value of the notes of different banks; and for very small sums, as twenty to fifty, and once for a hundred dollars. These exchanges appear to have been made to accommodate persons in this District, by giving them District notes or those current in the District in exchange for notes of distant banks. But it did not appear that these exchanges were ever made with public money.

But whatever may be the just construction of the conduct of the Post Office Department, said Mr. P., in dismissing the accusing clerks—they, or some of them, must certainly be deemed to have acted in contempt of this House; while the investigation was going on, and he believed almost from its commencement, partial and inflammatory statements were furnished to the editors of one or more newspapers, which were republished by others, calculated to make improper and unfounded impressions on the minds of all who read them. And those statements, from their nature, must be presumed to have been made by those clerks, or some of them.

Mr. GROSVENOR, in reply to Mr. JOHNSON said, if the rule was once established that they could not inquire into such transactions, every officer of the Government would set them at defiance, and might do injustice with impunity. He acknowledged he knew of no fact or evidence of improper conduct in this affair; but the gentleman himself had by his arguments proved the necessity of resisting conduct such as had been mentioned respecting the clerks. Did not the House see it was holding a threat over the heads of the remaining clerks to prevent them from giving testimony? If it was a fact, it would require the interference of the House. Admit, said Mr. G., that you have no right to interfere with the discretion of the Heads of Departments unless they touch our privileges, still this is a case requiring the interference of Congress.

Mr. CREIGHTON said, notwithstanding the absence of the chairman and two of the members of the select committee, as a member of that committee he should be gratified that the Committee of the Whole should be discharged from the further consideration of the report, that the subject might be brought before the House for full examination; but would have been better pleased if the House had indulged the chairman in the call made by him a few days since to go into Committee of the Whole on the report, as more time for discussion would have been afforded. The committee had a laborious task to perform; their sittings were long and frequent, and many witnesses were examined. He believed all the clerks in the General Post Office were examined; the books and papers stated by any of the witnesses as containing evidence relating to the inquiry were produced and submitted to the clerks calling for the same, to improve as evidence; the names of many individuals were furnished by the clerks as witnesses, and in every instance they were summoned and carefully examined. After the examination was closed three clerks in the General Post Office were dismissed, as they afterwards informed the committee, and requested to be again heard. The committee, anxious to afford the fullest opportunity, convened and heard the statements they had to make, and at their instance summoned several witnesses, who attended and testified before them. The books of the Post Office were again produced, on the suggestion of one of the clerks, which he said contained important testimony, from which no testimony was submitted to the committee that had not been previously examined. A full and fair opportunity was afforded to all persons, whether in the character of accusers or witnesses; and the result had been presented to the House. He should vote for the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, and even at this late period of the session hoped the report would be taken up and acted on by the House.

Mr. FORNEY said, believing that the merit of this report was not now properly under consideration, he should only state in answer to the inquiries made by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. McKEE,) that the committee were not in possession of any facts relative to the dismissal of the clerks in the Post Office, except what were given by the clerks themselves. The committee did not think it their duty to enter into an investigation of the motives governing the Postmaster General in dismissing these clerks, as he undoubtedly had the power to do in that case as he should think proper. Had the committee discovered any undue influence or tampering with the witnesses, it was probable they would then have thought it their duty to have gone into a more particular examination of the matter. During this investigation, two of the principal clerks in that Department stated to the committee that they were denied access to the books of the office, by which they could be enabled to support the charges. In consequence of this statement, the books thought necessary were demanded by the committee; the evidence resulting from their investigation is before the House. But it is an undeniable fact, that, a short time after the commencement of this investigation, these clerks stated that they were removed from the duties they used to perform, and reduced to do the lowest drudgery in the office. While up, Mr. F. felt it his duty to state, that he was fully in possession of the sentiments of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) a member of this committee, now absent, in relation to this report—which Mr. F. had been requested to state when this subject should be taken up.

Mr. HALL was decidedly of opinion with Mr. GROSVENOR, not that the amount was of consequence, but on principle. If the alleged conduct respecting the clerks was tolerated, you take away all inquiry into the conduct of the Heads of Departments. He knew not that the fact was as had been suggested; but shall we suffer men, said Mr. H. to be discharged from their public employment because they were expected to give evidence of improper conduct? He repeated, he knew not that the fact was so; but if it was, he would redress it. He inquired whether a certain piece of evidence in his hands respecting the sale of a draft had been submitted to the committee.

Adjournment.

H. of R.

Mr. CREIGHTON stated in reply, that the circumstance referred to had been the subject of investigation, during the examination of other testimony, on oath.

Mr. CULPEPER's motion was then agreed to; and, on motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, the report was laid on the table.

TUESDAY, April 30.

Mr. RANDOLPH presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of Charlotte county, in the State of Virginia, praying that the mails may not be transmitted or opened on Sundays.—Laid on the table.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed on the first of March last, to inquire into an illegal traffic in slaves, carried on through the medium of this District, by persons in different States, reported various testimony collected by the committee, in the course of their investigation of the subject; but without other report of facts or opinions. The documents containing the testimony, were ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill from this House entitled, "an act concerning invalid pensioners," and the "resolution relative to the more effectual collection of the public revenue," with amendments to each. They have passed a bill "making further appropriations for the year 1816." In which bill and amendments they request the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making further appropriations for the year 1816," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill; and after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with an amendment, which was read and concurred in by the House, and the amendment ordered to be engrossed, and the bill, as amended, read a third time to-day. The bill was then read the third time and passed.

The House then took up the amendments of the Senate to the invalid pension bill, striking out the pensions to various persons inserted in the bill by this House. The consideration of these amendments produced a good deal of discussion on the merits of particular cases. The amendments were all finally agreed to.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the resolution relative to the more effectual collection of the public revenue, which were concurred in by the House.—Ayes 68, noes 23.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed a resolution "proposing the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him of the approaching recess of Congress; and have appointed a committee on their part."

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia,
Resolved, That the sum of fifty dollars, each, be paid out of the contingent fund of this House, to John Oswald Dunn, Elextius Spalding, Manly A. Beach, George Thomas, Samuel Stewart, William Pancost, and George Cooper, the attendants of this House, for their faithful services during the present session.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia,
Resolved, That the sum of one hundred dollars be paid to James Claxton, out of the contingent funds of this House, for his services in the post office of this House; and fifty dollars to James Barron, out of the same fund, as an attendant.

The House took up the resolution from the Senate, "for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him of the intended recess of Congress;" which being read, was concurred in by the House, and Messrs. CRAWFORD and REED were appointed a committee conformably thereto on the part of this House.

A message from the Senate notified the House that the Senate, having completed the legislative business before them, are about to adjourn.

Mr. CRAWFORD, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President, reported that they had performed that duty, and that the President had informed them he had no further communication to make.

The SPEAKER then rose and addressed the House with some brief but cordial valedictory expressions; after which he adjourned the House sine die.

SPAIN.—PROHIBITION OF ILLEGAL EXPEDITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES.

A PROCLAMATION,

By the President of the United States of America.

Whereas information has been received that sundry persons, citizens of the United States, or residents within the same, and especially within the State of Louisiana, are conspiring together to begin and set on foot, provide, and prepare the means for a military expedition or enterprise against the dominions of Spain, with which the United States are happily at peace; that, for this purpose, they are collecting arms, military stores, provisions, vessels, and other means; and deceiving and seducing honest and well-meaning citizens to engage in their unlawful enterprises; or organizing, officering, and arming themselves for the same, contrary to the laws in such cases made and provided: I have, therefore, thought fit to issue this my proclamation, warning, and enjoining all faithful citizens who have been led, without due knowledge or consideration, to participate in the said unlawful enterprises, to withdraw from the same without delay; and commanding all persons whatsoever engaged or concerned in the same to cease all further proceedings therein, as they will answer the contrary at their peril. And I hereby enjoin and require all officers, civil and military, of the United States, or of any of the States or Territories, all judges, justices, and other officers of the peace, all military officers of the army or navy of the United States, and officers of the militia, to be vigilant, each within his respective department, and according to his functions, in searching out and bringing to punishment all persons engaged or concerned in such enterprises; in seizing and detaining, subject to the disposition of the law, all arms, military stores, vessels, or other means provided or providing for the same; and, in general, in preventing the carrying on such expedition or enterprise, by all the lawful means within their power: and I require all good and faithful citizens and others, within the United States, to be aiding and assisting herein; and especially in the discovery, ap-

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at the City [L. s.] of Washington, the first day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the independence of the said United States of America the fortieth.

By the President:

JAMES MONROE, Secretary of State.

ALGIERS.

[Communicated to the Senate, December 6, 1815.]
To the Senate of the United States:

I lay before the Senate, for their consideration and advice, as to a ratification, a Treaty of Peace with the Dey of Algiers, concluded on the 30th day of June, 1815; with a letter relating to the same from the American Commissioners to the Secretary of State.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6, 1815.

Treaty of Peace and Amity concluded between the United States of America and His Highness Omar Bashaw, Dey of Algiers.

ARTICLE 1. There shall be, from the conclusion of this treaty, a firm, inviolable, and universal peace and friendship between the President and citizens of the United States of America, on the one part, and the Dey and subjects of the Regency of Algiers in Barbary, on the other, made by the free consent of both parties, and on the terms of the most favored nations: and if either party shall, hereafter, grant to any other nation any particular favor or privilege in navigation or commerce, it shall immediately become common to the other party—freely, when it is freely granted to such other nations; but when the grant is conditional, it shall be at the option of the contracting parties to accept, alter, or reject such conditions, in such manner as shall be most conducive to their respective interests.

ART. 2. It is distinctly understood between the contracting parties, that no tribute, either as biennial presents, or under any other form or name whatever, shall ever be required by the Dey and Regency of Algiers, from the United States of America, on any pretext whatever.

ART. 3. The Dey of Algiers shall cause to be immediately delivered up to the American squadron now off Algiers all the American citizens now in his possession, amounting to ten, more or less; and all the subjects of the Dey of Algiers now in possession of the United States, amounting to five hundred, more or less, shall be delivered up to him; the United States, according to the usages of civilized nations, requiring no ransom for the excess of prisoners in their favor.

ART. 4. A just and full compensation shall be made by the Dey of Algiers to such citizens of the United States as have been captured and detained by Algerine cruisers, or who have been forced to abandon their property in Algiers, in violation of the twenty-second article of the Treaty of Peace and Amity concluded between the United States and the Dey of Algiers on the 5th of September, 1795.

And it is agreed between the contracting parties, that, in lieu of the above, the Dey of Algiers shall cause to be delivered, forthwith, into the hands of the American Consul residing at Algiers, the whole of a quantity of bales of cotton left by the late Consul General of the United States in the public magazines in Algiers; and that he shall pay into the hands of the said Consul the sum of ten thousand Spanish dollars.

ART. 5. If any goods belonging to any nation with which either of the parties are at war should be loaded on board vessels belonging to the other party, they shall pass free and unmolested, and no attempts shall be made to take or detain them.

ART. 6. If any citizens or subjects, with their effects, belonging to either party, shall be found on board a prize vessel taken from an enemy by the other party, such citizens or subjects shall be liberated immediately; and in no case, or on any pretence whatever, shall any American citizen be kept in captivity or confinement, or the property of any American citizen found on board of any vessel belonging to any other nation with which Algiers may be at war be detained from its lawful owners, after the exhibition of sufficient proofs of American citizenship and of American property by the Consul of the United States residing at Algiers.

ART. 7. Proper passports shall immediately be given to the vessels of both the contracting parties, on condition that the vessels of war belonging to the Regency of Algiers, on meeting with merchant vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States of America, shall not be permitted to visit them with more than two persons besides the rowers; these only shall be permitted to go on board, without first obtaining leave from the commander of said vessel, who shall compare the passport, and immediately permit said vessel to proceed on her voyage; and should any of the subjects of Algiers insult or molest the commander, or any other person, on board a vessel so visited, or plunder any of the property contained in her, on complaint being made by the Consul of the United States residing in Algiers, and on his producing sufficient proof to substantiate the fact, the commander or rais of said Algerine ship or vessel of war, as well as the offenders, shall be punished in the most exemplary manner.

All vessels of war belonging to the United States of America, on meeting a cruiser belonging to the Regency of Algiers, or having seen her passports and certificates from the Consul of the United States residing in Algiers, shall permit her to proceed on her cruise unmolested, and without detention. No passports shall be granted by either party to any vessel but such as are absolutely the property of citizens or subjects of the said contracting parties, on any pretence whatever.

ART. 8. A citizen or subject of either of the contracting parties having bought a prize vessel condemned by the other party, or by any other nation, the certificate of condemnation and bill of sale shall be a sufficient passport for such vessel for six months, which, considering the distance between the two countries, is no more than a reasonable time for her to procure proper passports.

ART. 9. Vessels of either of the contracting parties, putting into the ports of the other, and having need of provisions or other supplies, shall be furnished at the market price; and if any such vessel should so put in from a distance at sea, and have occasion to repair, she shall be at liberty to land and re-embark her cargo, without paying any customs or duty whatever; but in no case shall she be compelled to land her cargo.

ART. 10. Should a vessel of either of the contracting parties be cast on shore within the territories of the other, all proper assistance shall be given to her crew; no pillage shall be allowed; the property shall remain at the disposal of the owners; and, if reshipped on board of any vessel for exportation, no customs or duties whatever shall be required to be paid thereon; and the crew shall be protected and succored, until they can be sent to their own country.

ART. 11. If a vessel of either of the contracting parties shall be attacked by an enemy within cannon-shot of the forts of the other, she shall be protected as much as possible. If she be in port, she shall not be seized or attacked, when it is in the power of the other party to protect her; and when she proceeds to sea, no enemy shall be permitted to pursue her from the same port within twenty-four hours after her departure.

Relations with Algiers.

ART. 12. The commerce between the United States of America and the Regency of Algiers, the protections to be given to merchants, masters of vessels, and seamen, the reciprocal rights of establishing Consuls in each country, and the privileges, immunities, and jurisdictions to be enjoyed by such Consuls, are declared to be on the same footing, in every respect, with the most favored nations, respectively.

ART. 13. The Consul of the United States of America shall not be responsible for the debts contracted by citizens of his own nation, unless he previously gives written obligations so to do.

ART. 14. On a vessel or vessels of war belonging to the United States anchoring before the city of Algiers, the Consul is to inform the Dey of her arrival, when she shall receive the salutes which are, by treaty or custom, given to the ships-of-war of the most favored nations on similar occasions, and which shall be returned, gun for gun; and if, after such arrival, so announced, any Christians, whatsoever, captives in Algiers, make their escape and take refuge on board any of the ships-of-war, they shall not be required back again; nor shall the Consul of the United States or commanders of said ships be required to pay anything for the said Christians.

ART. 15. As the Government of the United States of America has, in itself, no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquillity of any nation; and as the said States have never entered into any voluntary war, or act of hostility, except in defence of their just rights on the high seas, it is declared by the contracting parties, that no pretext arising from religious opinions shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two nations; and the Consuls and agents of both nations shall have liberty to celebrate the rites of their respective religions in their own houses.

The Consuls, respectively, shall have liberty and personal security given them to travel within the territories of each other, both by land and sea; and shall not be prevented from going on board any vessels they may think proper to visit; they shall likewise have liberty to appoint their own dragoman and broker.

ART. 16. In case of any dispute arising from the violation of any of the articles of this treaty, no appeal shall be made to arms, nor shall war be declared, on any pretext whatever; but, if the Consul residing at the place where the dispute shall happen shall not be able to settle the same, the Government of that country shall state their grievance in writing, and transmit the same to the Government of the other; and the period of three months shall be allowed for answers to be returned, during which time no act of hostility shall be permitted by either party; and, in case the grievances are not redressed, and a war should be the event, the Consuls and citizens or subjects of both parties, respectively, shall be permitted to embark with their effects unmolested, on board of what vessel or vessels they shall think proper reasonable time being allowed for that purpose.

ART. 17. If, in the course of events, a war should break out between the two nations, the prisoners captured by either party shall not be made slaves; they shall not be forced to hard labor, or other confinement than such as may be necessary to secure their safekeeping, and shall be exchanged rank for rank; and it is agreed that prisoners shall be exchanged in twelve months after their capture; and the exchange may be effected by any private individual legally authorized by either of the parties.

ART. 18. If any of the Barbary States, or other Powers at war with the United States, shall capture any American vessel and send her into any port of the Regency of Algiers, they shall not be permitted to sell her, but shall be forced to depart the port on procuring the requisite supply of provisions; but the vessels of war of the United States, with any prizes they may capture from their enemies, shall have liberty to frequent the ports of Algiers for refreshments of any kinds, and to sell such prizes in the said ports, without any other customs or duties than such as are customary on ordinary commercial importations.

ART. 19. If any of the citizens of the United States, or any persons under their protection, shall have any disputes with each other, the Consul shall decide between the parties; and whenever the Consul shall require any aid or assistance from the Government of Algiers to enforce his decision, it shall be immediately granted to him; and if any disputes shall arise between any citizens of the United States, and the citizens or subjects of any other nation having a Consul or agent in Algiers, such disputes shall be settled by the Consuls or agents of the respective nations; and any disputes or suits at law that may take place between any citizens of the United States, and the subjects of the Regency of Algiers, shall be decided by the Dey in person, and no other.

ART. 20. If a citizen of the United States should kill, wound, or strike a subject of Algiers; or, on the contrary, a subject of Algiers should kill, wound, or strike a citizen of the United States, the law of the country shall take place, and equal justice shall be rendered, the Consul assisting at the trial; but the sentence of punishment against an American citizen shall not be greater or more severe than it would be against a Turk in the same predicament. And if any delinquent should make his escape, the Consul shall not be responsible for him, in any manner whatever.

ART. 21. The Consul of the United States of America shall not be required to pay any customs or duties whatever on anything he imports from a foreign country for the use of his house and family.

ART. 22. Should any of the citizens of the United States of America die within the limits of the Regency of Algiers, the Dey and his subjects shall not interfere with the property of the deceased, but it shall be under the immediate direction of the Consul, unless otherwise disposed of by will. Should there be no Consul, the effects shall be deposited in the hands of some person worthy of trust, until the party shall appear who has a right to demand them, when he shall render an account of the property; neither shall the Dey nor his subjects give hindrance in the execution of any will that may appear.

ON BOARD THE U. S. SHIP GUERRIERE,
July 6, 1815.

I certify the foregoing to be a true copy of a treaty of peace negotiated by Commodore Decatur and myself with the Regency of Algiers, and signed by the Dey of that Regency on the 30th June, 1815.

WILLIAM SHALER.

UNITED STATES SHIP GUERRIERE,
BAY OF ALGIERS, July 4, 1815.

SIR: We have the honor to refer you to the official reports of Commodore Decatur to the Navy Department, for an account of the operations of this squadron previous to our arrival off Algiers, on the 28th ultimo.

Having received information that the Algerine squadron had been at sea for a considerable time longer than that to which their cruisers usually extend, and that a despatch-boat had been sent from Gibraltar to Algiers to inform them of our arrival in the Mediterranean, we thought that they might have made a harbor where they would be in safety. We, therefore, while they were in this state of uncertainty, believed it a proper moment to deliver the President's letter, agreeably to our instructions. Accordingly, on the 29th ultimo, a flag of truce was hoisted on board the Guerriere, with the Swedish flag at the main. A boat came off about noon, with Mr. Norderling, Consul of Sweden, and the captain of the port, who confirmed the intelligence we had before received, and to whom we communicated information of the capture of their frigate and brig. The impression made by these events was visible and deep. We were requested by the captain of the port (Mr. Norderling declaring he was not authorized to act) to state the conditions on which we would make peace; to which we replied by giving the letter of the President to the Dey, and by a note from us to him; a copy of which (No. 1) we have the honor to transmit herewith. The captain of the port then requested that hostilities should cease pending the negotiation, and that persons authorized to treat should go on shore; he and Mr. Norderling both affirming that the Minister of Marine had pledged himself for our security and return to our ships when we pleased. Both these propositions were rejected, and they were explicitly informed that the negotiation must be carried on on board the fleet, and that hostilities, as far as they respected vessels, could not cease. They then returned on shore. On the following day the same persons returned, and informed us that they were commissioned by the Dey to treat with us on the proposed basis, and their anxiety appeared extreme to conclude the peace immediately. We then brought forward the model of a treaty, which we declared would not be departed from in substance; at the same time declaring that, although the United States would never stipulate for paying tribute under any form whatever, yet, that they were a magnanimous and generous nation, who would, upon the presentation of Consuls, do what was customary with other great nations in their friendly intercourse with Algiers. The treaty was then examined, and they were of opinion that it would not be agreed to in its present form, and particularly requested that the article requiring the restitution of the property they had captured, and which had been distributed, might be expunged; alleging that such a demand had never before been made upon Algiers. To this it was answered that the claim was just, and would be adhered to. They then asked whether, if the treaty should be signed by the Dey, we would engage to restore the captured vessels? which we refused. They then represented that it was not the present Dey who had declared the war, which they acknowledged to be unjust; conceding that they were wholly in the wrong, and had no excuse whatever; requesting, however, that we would take the case of the Dey into consideration, and, upon his agreeing to terms with us, more favorable than had ever been made with any other nation, to restore the ships, which they stated would be of little or no value to us, but would be of great importance to him, as they would satisfy the people with the conditions of the peace we were going to conclude with him.

We consulted upon this question, and determined that, considering the state of those vessels, the sums that would be required to fit them for a passage to the United States, and the little probability of selling them in this part of the world, we would make a compliment of them to His Highness in the state they then were; the Commodore engaging to furnish them with an escort to this port. This, however, would depend upon their signing the treaty as presented to them, and could not appear as an article of it, but must be considered as a favor conferred on the Dey by the United States.

They then requested a truce, to deliberate upon the terms of the proposed treaty, which was refused; they even pleaded for three hours. The reply was, "not a minute; if your squadron appears in sight before the treaty is actually signed by the Dey, and the prisoners sent off, ours would capture them." It was finally agreed that hostilities should cease when we perceived their boat coming off with a white flag hoisted, the Swedish Consul pledging his word of honor not to hoist it unless the treaty was signed, and the prisoners in the boat. They returned on shore, and, although the distance was full five miles, they came back within three hours, with the treaty signed as we had concluded it, and the prisoners.

During the interval of their absence a corvette appeared in sight, which would have been captured if they had been detained one hour longer.

Commercial Convention with Great Britain.

The treaty has since been drawn out anew, translated by them, and duly executed by the Dey; which we have the honor to transmit herewith.

Mr. Shaler has since been on shore, and the cotton and money mentioned in the fourth article have been given up to him. They now show every disposition to maintain a sincere peace with us, which is, doubtless, owing to the dread of our arms; and we take this occasion to remark that, in our opinion, the only secure guaranty we can have for the maintenance of the peace just concluded with these people is, the presence in the Mediterranean of a respectable naval force.

As this treaty appears to us to secure every interest within the contemplation of the Government, and as it really places the United States on higher grounds than any other nation, we have no hesitation, on our part, in fulfilling such of its provisions as are within our power, in the firm belief that it will receive the ratification of the President and Senate.

We have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servants,

STEPHEN DECATUR,
WILLIAM SHALER.

The American Commissioners to the Dey of Algiers.

The undersigned have the honor to inform His Highness the Dey of Algiers that they have been appointed by the President of the United States of America Commissioners Plenipotentiary to treat of peace with his Highness; and that, pursuant to their instructions, they are ready to open a negotiation for the restoration of peace and harmony between the two countries, on terms just and honorable to both parties; and they feel it incumbent on them to state, explicitly, to His Highness, that they are instructed to treat upon no other principle than that of perfect equality, and on the terms of the most favored nations; no stipulation for paying any tribute to Algiers, under any form whatever, will be agreed to.

The undersigned have the honor to transmit, herewith, a letter from the President of the United States, and they avail themselves of this occasion to assure His Highness of their high consideration and profound respect.

COMMERCIAL CONVENTION WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

[Communicated to the Senate, December 6, 1815.]
To the Senate of the United States :

I lay before the Senate, for their consideration and advice, as to a ratification, a Convention to regulate the commerce between the United States and Great Britain, signed by their respective Plenipotentiaries on the 3d of July last, with letters relating to the same, from the American Plenipotentiaries to the Secretary of State; and also the declaration with which it is the intention of the British Government to accompany the exchange of the ratifications of the Convention.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6, 1815.

A Convention to regulate the Commerce between the Territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty.

The United States of America and His Britannic Majesty, being desirous, by a convention, to regulate the commerce and navigation between their respective countries, territories, and people, in such manner as to render the same reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory, have respectively named Plenipotentiaries, and given them full powers to treat of and conclude such convention: that is to say, the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, hath appointed for their Plenipotentiaries John Quincy Adams, Henry Clay, and Albert Gallatin, citizens of the United States; and His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, has named for his Plenipotentiaries the Right Honorable Frederick John Robinson, Vice President of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations, Joint Paymaster of His Majesty's Forces, and a member of the Imperial Parliament; Henry Goulburn, Esq., a member of the Imperial Parliament, and Under Secretary of State; and William Adams, Esq., Doctor of Civil Laws: and the said Plenipotentiaries, having mutually produced and shown their said full powers, and exchanged copies of the same, have agreed on and concluded the following articles, viz:

ART. 1. There shall be, between the territories of the United States of America and all the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty freely and securely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers in the territories aforesaid, to which other foreigners are permitted to come, to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any parts of the said territories, respectively; also to hire and occupy houses and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce; and, generally, the merchants and traders of each nation, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

ART. 2. No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, than are, or shall be, payable on the like articles, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country; nor shall any higher or other duties or charges be imposed in either of the two countries, on the exportation of any articles to the United States, or to His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, or of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, to or from the said territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, or to or from the said United States, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States, on British vessels, than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on vessels of the United States, than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

The same duties shall be paid on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, whether such importation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels; and the same duties shall be paid on the importation, into the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, whether such importation shall be in British vessels or vessels of the United States.

The same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties allowed, on the exportation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, to the United States, whether such exportation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels; and the same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties allowed, on the exportation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, to His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, whether such exportation shall be in British vessels or in vessels of the United States.

It is further agreed, that, in all cases where drawbacks, are, or may be, allowed upon the re-exportation of any goods the growth, produce, or manufacture, of either country, respectively, the amount of the said drawbacks shall be the same, whether the said goods shall have been originally imported in a British or an American vessel. But when such re-exportation shall take place from the United States in a British vessel, or from the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe in an American vessel, to any other foreign nation, the two contracting parties reserve to themselves, respectively, the right of regulating or diminishing, in such case, the amount of the said drawbacks.

The intercourse between the United States and

His Britannic Majesty's possessions in the West Indies and on the continent of North America shall not be affected by any of the provisions of this article, but each party shall remain in the complete possession of its rights with respect to such an intercourse.

ART. 3. His Britannic Majesty agrees that the vessels of the United States of America shall be admitted, and hospitably received at the principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, viz: Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, and Prince of Wales's island; and that the citizens of the said United States may freely carry on trade between the said principal settlements and the said United States, in all articles of which the importation and exportation, respectively, to and from the said territories, shall not be entirely prohibited: Provided, only, That it shall not be lawful for them, in any time of war between the British Government and any State or Power whatever, to export from the said territories, without the special permission of the British Government, any military stores, or naval stores, or rice. The citizens of the United States shall pay for their vessels, when admitted, no higher or other duty or charge than shall be payable on the vessels of the most favored European nations; and they shall pay no higher or other duties or charges on the importation or exportation of the cargoes of the said vessels than shall be payable on the same articles when imported or exported in the vessels of the most favored European nations. But it is expressly agreed that the vessels of the United States shall not carry any articles from the said principal settlements to any port or place, except to some port or place in the United States of America, where the same shall be unladen.

It is also understood that the permission granted by this article is not intended to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any part of the coasting trade of the said British territories; but the vessels of the United States, having in the first instance proceeded to one of the said principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, and then going with their original cargoes, or part thereof, from one of the said principal settlements to another, shall not be considered as carrying on the coasting trade.

The vessels of the United States may also touch for refreshment, but not for commerce, in the course of their voyage to or from the British territories in India, or to or from the dominions of the Emperor of China, at the Cape of Good Hope, the island of St. Helena, or such other places as may be in the possession of Great Britain, in the African or Indian seas; it being well understood that, in all that regards this article, the citizens of the United States shall be subject in all respects to the laws and regulations of the British Government from time to time established.

ART. 4. It shall be free for each of the two contracting parties, respectively, to appoint Consuls for the protection of trade in the dominions and territories of the other party; but, before any Commercial Convention with Great Britain.

Consul shall act as such, he shall, in the usual form, be approved and admitted by the Government to which he is sent; and it is hereby declared, that in case of illegal or improper conduct towards the laws or Government of the country to which he is sent, such Consul may either be punished according to law, if the laws will reach the case, or be sent back; the offended Government assigning to the other the reasons for the same.

It is hereby declared, that either of the contracting parties may except from the residence of Consuls such particular places as such party shall judge fit to be excepted.

ART. 5. This convention, when the same shall have been duly ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of their Senate, and by His Britannic Majesty, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory on the United States and His Majesty for four years from the date of its signature; and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner, if possible.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
HENRY CLAY,
ALBERT GALLATIN,
FREDERICK J. ROBINSON,
HENRY GOULBURN,
WILLIAM ADAMS.

Extract of a letter from the American Commissioners, Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, to the Secretary of State, dated LONDON, May 18, 1815.

Having had reason to believe that the British Government had abstained from answering the communication of the joint commission from Ghent of the — day of December, 1814, until they received official information of the American ratification of the Treaty of Peace, we thought it advisable, soon after that event was known to us, to repair to this city, in order that we might ascertain the disposition of this Government as to the commercial intercourse between the two countries.

Shortly after our arrival here, we were invited by Lord Castlereagh to an interview with him. A minute of the substance of the conversation which took place on that occasion, as drawn up and agreed to by the parties, is enclosed. We communicated to Mr. Goulburn, the next day, our answer upon the three subjects to which the conversation related.

In the interview with Lord Castlereagh, he had stated that four or five days might be necessary on their part to prepare for the proposed conversation. Nearly three weeks having elapsed without hearing further on the subject, we took what appeared to us a fit occasion to intimate our intention of leaving London. A few days after, we received an invitation from the Vice President of the Board of Trade, Mr. Robinson, to call at his office on the 11th instant. We accordingly attended, and were received by him and Messrs. Goulburn and Adams, two of the British Commissioners who had negotiated the Treaty of Ghent.

They opened the conversation by adverting to what had led to this interview, and professed themselves to be ready to receive any propositions we might choose to make. We observed, that in the treaties which America had heretofore made (particularly with this country) regulating commercial intercourse, there were generally comprised two subjects: one, which respected commercial regulations, applicable to a state of peace as well as of war; the other, which respected the rights and duties of the parties, one being at war and the other remaining at peace. Accordingly, our Government had instructed us to bring forward both those subjects.

As to the commercial intercourse, without at this time going into details, or minor points, which it might be necessary in the progress of the negotiation to adjust, we would content ourselves, in this unofficial conversation, with touching on the most important topics which it seemed to us desirable to discuss and arrange. These were, that the two countries should respectively be placed on the footing of the nation the most favored; that, in the trade between America and the British European dominions, all discriminating duties on tonnage and on merchandise, either imported or exported, should be abolished; that the trade between America and the British West Indies should be regulated, and placed on some more permanent basis than the occasional acts of the colonial authorities; that the nature and kind of intercourse between America and the adjoining British provinces should be defined and provided for; and that the trade with the British India possessions should be opened to America on liberal principles.

In regard to the discriminating duties, we remarked, that a proposition to abolish them first came from Great Britain, and a provision to that effect was inserted in the unratified treaty of 1806. Congress had taken up the matter at their last session, and passed an act, which we explained. We thought it desirable that they should be abolished, in order to prevent those collisions, and that system of commercial warfare, in which the two countries would probably be involved by an adherence to them. As an example, we mentioned the great extra duty to which, as we understood, the article of cotton was liable by the British laws, when imported in foreign vessels, and which, if persisted in, would certainly be met by some countervailing regulations.

With respect to the trade to British India, we observed, that we had no equivalent to offer for it; that it was for Great Britain to consider whether a commerce, consisting as it did almost entirely in the exchange of our specie for India produce, was not of a nature to deserve the most liberal encouragement; but that we had rather enter into no stipulation on the subject than be restricted to a direct intercourse, as had been proposed by the unratified treaty, both on the outward and return voyage.

On the other subject, (the rights and duties of the parties, one being at war and the other in a condition of peace,) we proceeded to remark, that whilst a prospect of a long European peace appeared to exist, as was the case when the Treaty of Ghent was concluded, it was less important to provide for questions arising under this head. But it was impossible to shut our eyes to the demonstrations everywhere making of a new war, which, if it should assume a maritime character, might again menace the harmony and good understanding between the two countries. It was desirable, therefore, to anticipate and provide for the evil. The first and most important point was that of impressment. Great Britain had always professed a willingness to receive and consider any proposition which America should be disposed to make on that subject. It would, perhaps, be unprofitable at this time to go into a discussion of the right; as to which we would merely remark, that it was impossible that there could be a stronger conviction on the part of Great Britain that it was with her, than there was on the part of America that it was on her side. It was better to look to some practical arrangement, by which, without concession of right by either party, the mischiefs complained of on both sides might be prevented. To this end the attention of our Government had been turned. We believed that Great Britain had never heretofore contended that the American Government was bound to prohibit the merchants of the United States from employing foreign seamen, any more than it was bound to forbid their shipping contraband articles. America was, however, now willing to take upon herself such an obligation, and to exclude British seamen from her merchant service; and we believed such exclusion might be as effectually executed as our revenue laws. Here we called their attention to the act which Congress had passed on that subject, and to the message of the President to that body towards the close of its last session. Upon the supposition that the exclusion of British seamen should be absolute and entire, there would no longer exist any ground for the claim of impressment, and, of course, no objection to its abandonment. We stated that, besides the motive which existed with our Government of guarding against collision with Great Britain, another powerful one operated—that of encouraging our native seamen, and of not being obliged to rely on the uncertain supply of foreigners. To this system, as a substitute for that of impressment, it did not appear to us that Great Britain could object, unless it was thought to be impracticable in its execution. We had no doubt ourselves that, even admitting that there might be, as in cases of smuggling, occasional instances of evasion of the system of exclusion, it would nevertheless be, upon the whole, much more favorable in its result to Great Britain. This system would apply to and operate upon every American vessel; whilst that of impressment reached only the cases of those vessels with which it accidentally came in contact. We were aware of the difficulties which had heretofore opposed a satisfactory arrangement on this subject. Still, it was one of such vital importance, so tending to bring the two countries into collision, that it was impossible it should receive a consideration too earnest and too anxious.

The next point which it seemed to us important to settle was, the trade of America with the colonies of the enemies of Great Britain. Towards the end of the last European war, questions growing out of that trade had been terminated by the conquest of those colonies by Great Britain; but many of them having been restored at the peace, the disputes which heretofore existed might again arise. The former arrangements on this subject might, with some modifications, serve as a basis.

We then stated that we did not intend, in this preliminary and unofficial conversation, to discuss the other points belonging to this branch of the subject. A definition of blockades was desirable, and could not, it seemed, be attended with much difficulty, as we believed that there was no real difference between the two countries with respect to the abstract principle; but we apprehended that the disputes which might hereafter take place on that subject would arise almost exclusively from questions of fact, which no previous definition could prevent.

As, in the event of war, Great Britain might desire to know the disposition of our Government on the subject of privateers and prizes, we would only now say that the principle which might be adopted with respect to Great Britain, whether of admission or exclusion, must equally and impartially apply to all the parties to the war.

These were all the topics noticed by us, and we enforced and illustrated them by various other observations.

The British gentlemen, professing not to have expected those points to be brought forward which applied to a belligerent state of one of the parties, expressed a wish to know whether, in our view, the two subjects were inseparable, and whether we could not come to an agreement on those topics which were probably less difficult to be adjusted, leaving the others for further consideration and future arrangement? We replied, that, heretofore, they had always been blended together by our Government, and that we intended to bring them all up for consideration; that, at present, however, we only presented them for consideration, as it would be premature, at this time, to make any of them a sine qua non; and that whether a treaty omitting some of them would be acceptable, must depend on its general tenor, and upon the extent and importance of the subjects which might be comprehended in the arrangement.

They proceeded to remark that some of the subjects had been always found to involve extreme difficulty, particularly that of impressment; that Great Britain was certainly prepared, at all times, to receive and to consider any proposition that America might be disposed to make in relation to it; but one of the gentlemen remarked that, from the deep interest which was felt by Great Britain in it, she must view with great jealousy (by which, he said, he meant vigilance) any such proposition; that the inquiry which they had just made as to our willingness to separate the two subjects proceeded from a wish to ascertain whether it were likely that any practical result could be speedily obtained, if they entered upon the negotiation at this time.

On the subject of discriminating duties, mentioned by us, they said their Government would receive favorably the proposition for a mutual abolition of them. As to the trade with India, their Government was not at all disposed to shut us out from it. In regard to the trade to the West Indies, considering the difficulties which had heretofore presented themselves in placing it, by treaty, upon a footing satisfactory to both parties, they feared it would not now be practicable to enter into any stipulation respecting it which should meet the views of the two countries.

The interview terminated by their stating that they would report to the Cabinet the substance of what had passed between us, and by their pledging themselves to do all in their power to afford us an early answer.

On the 16th instant, having been again invited by the Vice President of the Board of Trade to call at his office, we accordingly attended, and were received by the same gentlemen. They stated that they had reported to the Cabinet what had passed at the last interview, and were now prepared to give us an answer on the several topics to which the conversation related; in doing this, they would observe the order which had been marked out by us.

1st. On the commercial intercourse between the two countries, they were authorized to state that their Government was ready to treat with us on the footing of the most favored nation, and was also willing to enter into any arrangement by which all discriminating duties on importations and tonnage should be mutually done away. They were willing to admit us to the enjoyment of the trade with British India, unclogged by the restriction on the outward voyage contained in the unratified treaty, but must still insist on that contained in the treaty of 1794, on the return voyage. Considering that we had candidly stated that we had no equivalent to offer, except what was to be found in the trade itself, they would expect, for this concession, a spirit of accommodation on our side in other parts of the commercial arrangement—the fur trade, or some other.

The trade with the British West Indies, they stated, had always been a subject of great difficulty, and their Government was not prepared to make any change in that colonial policy to which they had so long adhered; but they would hope that this would not form any obstacle to the negotiation.

With respect to the trade with their North American possessions, they were ready to receive and discuss any propositions we might have to offer, with an anxious desire to place it on a footing mutually satisfactory.

2dly. On those subjects which related to a state in which one of the parties should be at war and the other in peace, it was not necessary to disguise that they had been always attended with great difficulties. Still they were willing, in a spirit of amity and with candor, to receive and to discuss any propositions we might offer.

With regard to blockades, they could not think it necessary to enter into any treaty definition of them, as the questions which might hereafter arise on that subject, according to our own statement, would relate rather to the fact than to the principle, on which the two Governments seemed to agree. Indeed, they thought that such a definition might tend to weaken, as implying a doubt of the correctness of the principle.

In relation to the trade with enemies' colonies, besides the intrinsic difficulty of the question, as heretofore experienced in all attempts to arrange it, there was another, arising out of their want of information as to whether France had adopted any, and what, system of colonial policy, since the restoration of her colonies. It might be that she had opened their trade to foreign nations in peace as well as in war; in which case, the questions that had heretofore existed could not be agitated again.

Impressment had, they continued, of all this class of subjects, been found most difficult to arrange. They were aware how important it was considered in both countries, and how, in both, it touched public sensibility. As heretofore, they were now ready to receive and consider any proposition our Government might make respecting it; and, even without any treaty stipulation, their Government was now anxiously engaged in devising means to prevent the abuses of which we complain. If the law which we had mentioned at the last interview should be effectual in its object, it would doubtless do away a great motive with them for impressment. Still they were bound to consider, with the most vigilant attention, any proposition for the abandonment of what they must consider a right essential to their safety. That law did not, however, as they understood, settle the question who were to be considered as British subjects—a question on which the two countries might not be able to come to an understanding.

With regard to our ideas respecting privateers and prizes, they were certainly fair and unexceptionable.

As they had hinted at some accommodation in the fur trade, or in other parts of the commercial arrangement, for their supposed concession respecting the India trade, we thought the occasion suitable for stating that we were positively instructed not to consent to the renewal of the trade between British subjects and the Indians within our territories. We stated that the disposition of our Government on this subject did not proceed from commercial, but political considerations. They did not insist upon it, nor seem to think that the determination of our Government would prevent an arrangement of the Canada trade. One of them inquired whether we expected, in like manner, to be excluded from the trade with the Indians in their territories? To which we replied, certainly.

We explained the law for the exclusion of foreign seamen from our service, and mentioned that the naturalization of seamen would be almost altogether prevented, in future, by the necessity of a continued residence of five years. We stated that we were authorized to enter into stipulations that would forbid the employment of such British seamen as might, under our laws, be hereafter naturalized; but that we could not do it with respect to those who were already naturalized. We had thought that, as to them, an exception might be made, permitting, on both sides, the voluntary employment of such seamen, natives of one country, as might have heretofore been naturalized under the laws of the other country. We added, that the number of British seamen already naturalized, which could constitute, as it appeared to us, the only difficulty in an arrangement, was very inconsiderable. Doctor Adams concurred in opinion that there were not many.

We made some further explanations, and finally told them that, considering the dispositions which we had been happy to meet with in them, we would now say, that we would enter upon the negotiation; reserving to ourselves, however, the right, as our powers were several as well as joint, to withdraw from it if circumstances should make it eligible to do so, and to leave Mr. Adams, whom we daily expected, to conclude it.

The interview closed by their undertaking to provide themselves immediately with the necessary powers to proceed in the negotiation, and by an assurance that they would continue to do all in their power to bring it to a speedy and successful issue.

Extract of a minute of a conversation which took place at Lord Castlereagh's, between his Lordship and Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, April 16, 1815.

Lord Castlereagh then called the attention of the American Commissioners to a communication made by them at Ghent, relative to their power to treat on the commercial intercourse between the two countries. He said, before he gave an answer to that communication, he should be glad, if it were agreeable to the American Commissioners, that there should be an unofficial conversation between them and the British Commissioners who negotiated the Treaty of Peace, together with Mr. Robinson, whom he would associate with them for that purpose, to ascertain if it were likely that some general principles could be agreed upon to form the basis of a treaty of commerce. He should prefer that this conversation, like that which he understood had taken place in the former negotiation between Lords Holland and Auckland, and Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, should be free from official forms; and thought such a course best calculated to ascertain if it were likely that the two Governments could come to any practical result on this interesting subject.

It was observed by one of the American Commissioners, that such a conversation would be on terms of inequality, (the American Commissioners being invested with powers, and the other gentlemen having none,) unless it was understood not only that it should be considered as entirely unofficial, but that the same gentlemen should afterwards be commissioned to conclude a treaty, if it were thought that one could be formed. Lord Castlereagh remarked, in reply, that such was certainly his intention.

The conversation ended in an understanding that the American Commissioners would consult together upon the three topics mentioned by Lord Castlereagh, and communicate on the following day to Mr. Goulbourn the result of their deliberations.

The American Plenipotentiaries to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, July 3, 1815.

SIR: We have the honor to transmit a convention for regulating the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, which we concluded this day with the British Plenipotentiaries.

Messrs. Clay and Gallatin's despatch of the 18th May last has informed you of the preliminary steps taken by them on that subject. Mr. Adams arrived in London on the 24th of May, and on the 5th of June we were invited by Messrs. Robinson, Goulbourn, and Adams, to meet them on the 7th. At this conference, after a mutual exhibition of our powers, and some general observations, we delivered to them our project of a commercial convention, a copy of which (marked No. 1) is herewith enclosed. They promised to take it into immediate consideration, and on the 9th informed us that they would prepare and transmit to us a contre-projet.

Believing that there was no prospect of an immediate arrangement on the subject of seamen, and knowing that without it no treaty defining the rights and duties of belligerents and neutrals was admissible, we excluded all that related to that branch of the subject from our projet, and confined it to objects purely commercial.

We took the third article of the Treaty of 1794, respecting the intercourse with Canada, as the basis of the corresponding article: omitting, according to our instructions, whatever related to the Indian trade. In drawing the other articles, we were principally guided by the unratified Treaty of 1806; by the instructions given in relation to it by the Secretary of State, in his despatch of May 20, 1807; and by the act of Congress of the 3d March last, for abolishing all discriminating duties. From the previous explicit declarations of the British Plenipotentiaries, we deemed it useless to offer any article on the subject of the intercourse with the West India islands, and only inserted a clause to prevent the application to that intercourse of the provisions contemplated by the convention.

On the 16th the British Plenipotentiaries addressed to us a note, enclosing their contre-projet, (marked No. 2.) and on the 17th we transmitted our answer, (marked No. 3.) The whole subject was discussed at large in conferences held on the 19th and 21st. The British Plenipotentiaries, in a note of the 10th, (marked No. 4.) stated the substance of their answer to ours of the 17th. In the conference of the 21st we delivered the additional clause to the second article of the contre-projet, (marked No. 5,) and afterwards, on the same day, we transmitted our note, marked No. 6.

It will be perceived, by these notes, that we had come to an understanding as to the intercourse between the United States and the British territories in Europe, and that we disagreed on three points—the intercourse with Canada; placing, generally, both countries on the footing of the most favored nations; and the intercourse with the British East Indies.

On the first point, the British Plenipotentiaries persisted in refusing to admit that the citizens of the United States should have the right to take their produce down the river St. Lawrence to Montreal, and down the river Chambly (or Sorel) to the St. Lawrence; and, without that permission, the article was useless to us, and unequal in its practical operation. The provision that the importation of our produce into Canada should not be prohibited, unless the prohibition extended generally to all similar articles, afforded us no security, as no similar articles are imported into Canada from any other foreign country; whilst the corresponding provision respecting the importation into the United States, through Canada, of the produce and manufactures of Great Britain, effectually prevented us from prohibiting such an importation, since this could not be done without extending the prohibition to the importation of all similar articles, either of British or other growth or manufacture, into the Atlantic ports of the United States.

The article for placing, respectively, the two countries on the footing of the most favored nation, limited, as was insisted on by the British Plenipotentiaries, to the intercourse between the United States and the European territories of Great Britain, was unnecessary, since all that appeared desirable on that subject was secured by the second article; and a provision of that nature, unless offering some obvious advantage, was deemed embarrassing, on account of the difficulties attached to its execution.

With this view of the two subjects, and finding that to arrange them in a satisfactory manner was impracticable, we proposed, in our note of the 21st, to omit altogether the articles relating to them.

On the subject of the intercourse with India, the British Plenipotentiaries, contrary to the impression made in the unofficial conversations on Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, insisted, on our official conferences, that our admission to that trade was, on the part of Great Britain, a concession altogether gratuitous, and for which, particularly as to the privilege of indirect outward voyages, she ultimately expected an equivalent; whilst we strenuously contended that an equivalent was found in the trade itself, which was highly beneficial to India, or, at all events, considering the nature of the commercial intercourse generally between the two countries, in the other provisions of the convention. On the same ground, we urged our claim to be placed in India on the same footing, at least, as the most favored nations; to which it was replied that they made a distinction between those nations which had possessions there and those which had none. The refusal not being altogether explicit, we renewed our proposal to that effect in our note.

The British Plenipotentiaries, in a note of the 23d, (marked No. 7,) acceded to our proposal to omit the third and fifth articles, and refusing that on the subject of Indians, offered to omit the article altogether, and to sign a convention embracing only the provisions respecting the intercourse between the United States and the British territories in Europe.

This proposal we rejected in our note of the 24th, (marked No. 8.) But in order to meet, if practicable, the views of the British Government, and to avoid making any distinction between the East India trade and the other branches of commercial intercourse, we proposed to limit the duration of the whole convention to four years; and we offered, as an alternative, an arrangement for the sole purpose of abolishing the discriminating duties, in conformity with the act of Congress of the last session.

In a note of the 26th, (marked No. 9,) the British Plenipotentiaries informed us that they found it necessary to refer our last proposals to their Government; and by their note of the 29th, (marked No. 10,) they accepted our offer of a convention embracing the East India article, and limited to four years, to be calculated from the date of its signature. We replied to this in a note dated 30th June, (and marked No. 11,) and on the same day arranged, in a conference, the details of the convention.

We beg leave to add, that the same restriction which confines our vessels to the principal ports of India is, except in special cases, imposed by the act of Parliament on British subjects; and that, besides the discrimination in the export duty from England, the difference on the import duty on the article of cotton had, by a late act of Parliament, been increased to two-pence sterling per pound in favor of every species imported in British vessels, and even of Brazil cotton imported in Portuguese vessels.

We have the honor to be, respectfully, &c.
JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
H. CLAY,
ALBERT GALLATIN.

Commercial Convention with Great Britain.

No. 1.

Projet of the American Ministers.

ART. 1. There shall be between the territories of the United States and all the dominions of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, a reciprocal and perfect liberty of commerce and navigation. The people and inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty, freely and securely, and without hindrance and molestation, to come with their ships and cargoes to the lands, countries, cities, ports, places, and rivers within the territories and dominions aforesaid, to enter into the same, to resort there, and to remain and reside there without any limitation of time; also, to hire and possess houses and warehouses, for the purposes of their commerce; and, generally, the merchants and traders on each side shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always, as to what respects this article, to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

ART. 2. No other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the dominions of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, nor on the importation into His Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States, than are or shall be payable on the like articles being of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of any other foreign country. Nor shall any higher duties or charges be imposed, in either of the two countries, on the exportation of any articles to the United States, or to His Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to every other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States, or of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe, to or from the said States or the said dominions, which shall not equally extend to all other nations. No other or higher duties or charges shall be imposed, in any of the ports of the United States, on British vessels, (such only excepted as may be bound from or to British possessions to which vessels of the United States are not permanently admitted,) than shall be payable in the said ports by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe, on the vessels of the United States, than are or shall be payable in the said ports by British vessels. The same duties of exportation and importation, and also the same drawbacks and bounties, shall be respectively paid and allowed in either country on all articles the produce, growth, or manufacture, of the United States or of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe, whether such exportation or importation be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels.

ART. 3. His Britannic Majesty agrees that the vessels of the United States shall be admitted, and hospitably received, in all the seaports and harbors of the British dominions in the East Indies; and that the citizens of the said States may freely carry on a trade with the said territories, in all articles of which the importation or exportation respectively to or from the said territories shall not be entirely prohibited: Provided, only, That it shall not be lawful for them, in any time of war between the British Government and any other Power or State whatever, to export from the said territories, without the special permission of the British Government there, any military or naval stores, or rice.

The citizens of the United States shall pay for their vessels, when admitted into the said ports, no other or higher duty or charge than shall be payable on British vessels in the ports of the United States; and they shall pay no other or higher duties or charges on the importation or exportation of the cargoes of the said vessels than shall be payable on the same articles when imported or exported in British vessels. But it is expressly agreed that the vessels of the United States shall not carry any of the articles exported by them from the said British territories to any port or place, except to some port or place in America, where the same shall be unladen; or to some port or place, or ports or places in China, or in the Indian seas, whence the said vessels shall proceed, as aforesaid, to some port or place in America, and there unladen the whole of the articles exported, in the manner abovementioned, from the aforesaid British territories; and such regulations shall be adopted by both parties as shall from time to time be found necessary to enforce the due and faithful observance of this stipulation. It is also understood that the permission granted by this article is not to extend to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any part of the coasting trade of the said British territories, without the special permission of the British Government there; but the vessels going from one port to another of the said territories, for the sole purposes either of discharging their original cargoes, or part thereof, or of completing their return cargoes, are not to be considered as carrying on the coasting trade. Neither is this article to be construed to allow the citizens of the United States to settle or reside within the said territories, or to go into the interior parts thereof, without the permission of the British Government established there; and if any transgression shall be attempted against the regulations of the British Government in this respect, the observance of the same shall and may be enforced against the citizens of America, in the same manner as against British subjects or others transgressing the same rule. And the citizens of the United States, whenever they arrive in any port or harbor in the said territories, or if they should be permitted, in manner aforesaid, to go to any other place therein, shall always be subject to the laws, government, and jurisdiction, of whatsoever nature, established in such harbor, port, or place, according as the same may be. The vessels of the United States may also touch for refreshment at the island of St. Helena, or at such other ports or places as may be in the possession of Great Britain in the African or Indian seas, but subject in all respects to such regulations as the British Government may from time to time establish there.

Commercial Convention with Great Britain.

ART. 4. The navigation of all the lakes, rivers, and water communications, the middle of which is the boundary between the United States and His Britannic Majesty's dominions on the continent of North America, shall, at all times, be free to the citizens of the United States and to His Majesty's subjects. The said citizens and subjects may freely carry on trade and commerce with each other, and, for that purpose, pass and repass by land or inland navigation, into the respective territories of the two parties on the said continent; and no higher or other tolls, or rates of ferrage, than what are or shall be payable by natives, shall be demanded on either side. All goods or merchandise, whose importation into the United States shall not be wholly prohibited, may freely, for the purposes of the commerce above-mentioned, be carried into the same, in the manner aforesaid, by His Majesty's subjects; and such goods and merchandise shall be subject to no higher or other duties than would be payable by citizens of the United States, on the importation of the same in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the said United States; and, in like manner, all goods and merchandise, whose importation into His Majesty's said territories in America shall not be entirely prohibited, may freely, for the purposes of commerce above-mentioned, be carried into the same, in the manner aforesaid, by the citizens of the United States; and such goods and merchandise shall be subject to no higher or other duties than would be payable by His Majesty's subjects on the importation of the same from Europe into the said territories. All goods not prohibited to be imported from the said territories, respectively, may, in like manner, be carried out of the same by the two parties. No duty of importation or exportation shall be levied by either party on peltries or furs which may be brought, in the manner aforesaid, by land or inland navigation, from the said territories of one party into the said territories of the other party.

ART. 5. It shall be free for each of the two contracting parties, respectively, to appoint consuls for the protection of trade, and agents for the protection of seamen, to reside in the dominions and territories of the other party; and the said consuls and agents shall enjoy the liberties and rights which belong to them by reason of their functions. But before any consul or agent aforesaid shall act as such, he shall be, in the usual form, approved and admitted by the party to whom he is sent; and it is hereby declared to be lawful and proper, that, in case of illegal or improper conduct towards the laws or Government, a consul or agent aforesaid may either be punished according to law, if the laws will reach the case, or be dismissed, or even sent back; the offended Government assigning to the other the reasons for the same.

ART. 6. It being the intention of the high contracting parties, that the people of their respective dominions shall be placed on the footing of the most favored nation, it is agreed, that in case either party shall hereafter grant any additional advantage in navigation or trade to any other nation, the citizens or subjects of the other party shall fully participate therein; freely, where it is freely granted to such other nation, or yielding the same compensation where the grant is made for some equivalent.

No. 2.

The British Plenipotentiaries to the American Plenipotentiaries.

BOARD OF TRADE, June 16, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to transmit to the Plenipotentiaries of the United States a contre-projet for the arrangement of the commercial intercourse between the two countries. The American Plenipotentiaries will observe, that the article respecting the British East Indies is not proposed to be included in the body of the Treaty, but in a separate article, and more limited in point of duration, than would be suitable to the arrangements of the Treaty itself. The undersigned, nevertheless, flatter themselves that the American Plenipotentiaries will see in the proposed article for the East India intercourse, a proof of the liberal and conciliatory disposition with which the British Government is disposed to act upon the subject.

It will be recollected that at one of the unofficial conferences, and, subsequently, at the first official conference held with the American Plenipotentiaries, the undersigned stated, by order of their Government, that if the power of going from the United States to the British dominions in the East Indies by an indirect course were conceded, Great Britain must be considered as entitled to some equivalent for the concession, and that the fur trade was pointed out by the undersigned as capable of furnishing that equivalent.

The American Plenipotentiaries having stated that their instructions did not permit them to grant, by stipulation, any commercial intercourse between His Majesty's subjects and the Indians residing within the acknowledged boundaries of the United States, and not having suggested any other means of finding an equivalent, the undersigned would have been fully justified in tendering a contre-projet which wholly omitted the concession in question. But His Majesty's Government, anxious to renew the commercial relations of the two countries, in the true spirit of peace and harmony, has authorized the undersigned to offer a separate article, by which the indirect voyage from the United States to the British East Indies will be permitted, without equivalent, for the space of two years, in the confident hope that, during that period, the American Government will be enabled to propose such an equivalent as may induce Great Britain to make that permission commensurate with the general duration of the treaty.

The undersigned will be happy to have the honor of seeing the American Plenipotentiaries on any day which may suit their convenience, and request them to accept the assurance of their high consideration.

F. ROBINSON,
HENRY GOULBURN,
WILLIAM ADAMS.

Contre-projet of the British Commissioners.

ARTICLE 1. There shall be, between all the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, and the territories of the United States of America, a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty fully and securely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers in the territories aforesaid, to which other foreigners are permitted to come; to enter into the same, and remain and reside in any parts of the said territories, respectively; also to hire and occupy warehouses for the purposes of their commerce; and, generally, the merchants and traders of each nation, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

ART. 2. No other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States; and no other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of his Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country; nor shall any other or higher duties or charges be imposed in either of the two countries on the exportation of any articles to His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, or to the United States, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed upon the exportation or importation of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, or of the United States, to or from the said territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe, or to or from the said United States, which shall not extend to all other nations. No other or higher duties or charges shall be imposed in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States, than shall be payable on British vessels; nor in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels, than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

ART. 3. The navigation of all lakes, rivers, and water communications, the middle of which is or may be the boundary between His Britannic Majesty's territories on the continent of North America, and the United States, shall, with the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, at all times be free to His Majesty's subjects and the citizens of the United States. The inhabitants of His Britannic Majesty's territories in North America, and the citizens and subjects of the United States, may freely carry on trade and commerce by land or inland navigation, as aforesaid, with goods and merchandise the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British territories in Europe or North America, or of the United States, respectively, within the territories of the two parties, respectively, on the said continent, (the country within the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company only excepted;) and no other or higher duties or tolls, or rates of ferriage, or portage, than what are or shall be payable by natives, respectively, shall be taken or demanded on either side. All goods or merchandise, whose importation into the United States shall not be wholly prohibited, may fully, for the purposes of the commerce abovementioned, be carried into the said United States, in the manner aforesaid, by His Britannic Majesty's subjects; and the said goods and merchandise shall be subject to no higher or other duties than would be payable by citizens of the United States on the importation of the same in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the United States. And, in like manner, all goods and merchandise the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, whose importation into His Majesty's said territories in America shall not be entirely prohibited, may fully, for the purposes of the commerce abovementioned, be carried into the same by land, or by means of such lakes, rivers, and water communications as abovementioned, by the citizens of the United States; and such goods and merchandise shall be subject to no other or higher duty than would be payable by His Majesty's subjects on the importation of the same from Europe into the said territories. No duty shall be levied by either party on peltries or furs which may be brought in the manner aforesaid by land or inland navigation, from the said territories of the other; but tolls, or rates of ferriage, or portage, may be demanded and taken in manner abovementioned on such peltries or furs.

It is hereby declared, that nothing in this article contained, as to the navigation of rivers, lakes, or water communications, shall extend to give a right of navigation upon or within the same, in those parts where the middle is not the boundary between His Britannic Majesty's territories and the United States of America.

ART. 4. It shall be free for each of the two contracting parties to appoint consuls for the protection of trade, to reside in the dominions and territories of the other party; but, before any consul shall act as such, he shall, in the usual form, be approved and admitted by the Government to which he is sent. And it is hereby declared that, in case of illegal or improper conduct towards the laws or Government of the country to which he is sent, such consul may either be punished according to law, if the laws will reach the case, or be sent back, the offended Government assigning to the other the reasons for the same.

It is hereby declared, that either of the contracting parties may except from the residence of consuls, such particular places as such party shall judge proper to be so excepted.

ART. 5. It being the intention of the contracting parties that the inhabitants of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, and the inhabitants of the United States, shall, in respect to commerce between the said territories, be placed on the footing of the most favored nations, it is agreed, that in case either of the contracting parties shall hereafter grant any additional advantages in commerce or navigation to any European nation as to the importation or exportation to or from such other European nation and His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, or to or from such European nation and the territories of the United States, the citizens and subjects of the other contracting party shall likewise enjoy the same, freely, where it has been freely granted to such other European nation; and, where conditionally granted, on the same terms and conditions on which such advantage shall have been granted, or on terms and conditions which may be afterwards agreed upon as equivalent thereto by the contracting parties.

FIRST SEPARATE ARTICLE.

His Britannic Majesty agrees that the vessels of the United States shall be admitted and hospitably received at the principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, videlicet, Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, and the Prince of Wales's island; and that the citizens of the said United States may fully carry on trade between the said principal settlements and the said United States, in all articles of which the importation and exportation, respectively, to and from the said territories, shall not be entirely prohibited: Provided, only, That it shall not be lawful for them, in any time of war between the British Government and any Power or State whatever, to export from the said territories, without the special permission of the British Government, any military stores, or naval stores, or rice. The citizens of the United States shall pay for their vessels, when admitted, no other or higher duty or charge than shall be payable on the vessels of the most favored European nations; and they shall pay no other or higher duties or charges on the importation or exportation of the cargoes of the said vessels, than shall be payable on the same articles when imported or exported in the vessels of the most favored European nation.

But it is expressly agreed, that the vessels of the United States shall not carry any articles from the said principal settlements to any port or place, except to some port or place in the United States of America, where the same shall be unladen.

It is also understood, that the permission granted by this article is not to extend to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any of the coasting trade of the said British territories; but the vessels of the United States having, in the first instance, proceeded to one of the said principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, and then going with their original cargoes, or part thereof, from one of the said principal settlements to another, shall not be considered as carrying on the coasting trade.

The vessels of the United States may also touch for refreshment, but not for commerce, in the course of their voyage to or from the British territories in India, at the Cape of Good Hope, the island of St. Helena, or such other places as may be in the possession of Great Britain in the African or Indian seas; it being well understood that, in all that regards this article, the citizens of the United States shall be subject in all respects to the laws and regulations of the British Government from time to time established.

SECOND SEPARATE ARTICLE.

It is hereby agreed and declared, that the first separate article of the present treaty shall be limited in its duration to the period of two years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the said treaty.

No. 3.

The American to the British Plenipotentiaries.

HARLEY STREET, June 17, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of His Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiaries of the 16th instant, enclosing their contre-projet for the arrangement of the commercial intercourse between the two countries.

Anxious to ascertain, with as little delay as possible, whether there be any probability that such an arrangement can now be concluded as shall be satisfactory to both parties, the undersigned will not at this time enter into a discussion of the subject, and, leaving minor points for subsequent consideration, will only propose the following alterations in the contre-projet of His Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiaries, viz:

ART. 2.—1st. To reinstate the clause in the projet of the undersigned which provided that the same duties, drawbacks, and bounties should be paid and allowed in either country, on the importation or exportation of articles the produce, growth, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, or of the United States.

2d. To reinstate the clause in the projet of the undersigned which excepted from the provision to equalize tonnage duties British vessels bound to or from British possessions to which vessels of the United States were not permanently admitted; or to introduce a new article, providing that neither the intercourse between the United States and His Britannic Majesty's possessions in the West Indies, nor that by sea between the said States and His Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, shall be affected by any article in the treaty, but that each party shall remain in the complete possession of its rights, in respect to such an intercourse.

ART. 3. To reinstate, in substance, the article proposed on that subject by the undersigned, so that the commerce by land or inland navigation, sanctioned by the article, be confined to that which may be carried on between the citizens of the United States and His Britannic Majesty's subjects; and so as not to preclude the citizens of the United States from carrying articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the said States down the river St. Lawrence, as far at least as Montreal, and down the waters of Lake Champlain, as far at least as the St. Lawrence; or, if no satisfactory arrangement can at present be formed on this subject, to omit the article altogether.

ART. 5. To place, generally, each nation on the footing of the most favored nation, without restricting that privilege, as relates to the citizens of the United States, to the commerce with His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe.

Second separate article to be omitted.

The undersigned will have the honor to wait on His Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiaries on Monday, the 19th instant, at two o'clock, at the Office of Trade, when the undersigned hope they will be able to communicate to them their final determination on the proposed alterations.

The undersigned request His Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiaries to accept the assurances of their distinguished consideration.

No. 4.

The British to the American Plenipotentiaries.

BOARD OF TRADE, June 20, 1815.

In compliance with the request of the American Plenipotentiaries, the undersigned have the honor to communicate to them, in writing, the substance of the observations which were made on the part of the British Plenipotentiaries, in the conference of yesterday, upon the different points referred to in the note of the American Plenipotentiaries of the 17th instant.

Upon the first point, relating to a part of the second article of the contre-projet of the undersigned, the British Plenipotentiaries stated it to be the intention of their Government to agree not only to a mutual equalization of such duties as may be properly called tonnage duties, but also of all duties upon the importation of goods the growth, produce, or manufacture of the two countries, respectively, whether imported in British or in American ships; they stated, further, their readiness to accede to a similar and mutual equalization of bounties payable upon the above articles. Upon the subject of drawbacks, they represented that the clause, as proposed by the American Plenipotentiaries, appeared to give to the vessels of the United States which might be engaged in the general re-exportation of American produce from this country to all other parts of the world an advantage equal to that enjoyed by British ships; and that this privilege went beyond the general principle of an article which was confined to the trade between the two countries, respectively. They expressed a wish to receive from the American Plenipotentiaries a more precise explanation of their views upon this point.

Upon the second point referred to in the note of the American Plenipotentiaries, the undersigned expressed their readiness to agree to a clause which should contain the latter alternative suggested by the American Plenipotentiaries.

Upon the third article, relating to the intercourse between Canada and the United States, the undersigned disclaimed any intention of obtaining, by any interpretation of the words of the article as they had proposed it, a right to an intercourse with the Indians residing within the acknowledged limits of the United States, which the American Plenipotentiaries had already stated that their instructions forbade them to concede. And they expressed their readiness to agree to the insertion of such words as would clear up any doubt which might exist upon the subject.

As to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence as far as Montreal, and that of the waters flowing from Lake Champlain to that river, the undersigned stated themselves not to be authorized to stipulate the concession of that indulgence in the way proposed by the American Plenipotentiaries. The undersigned likewise stated their objections to extending Article 5 beyond the intercourse between the United States and His Britannic Majesty's dominions in Europe.

In regard to the two separate articles of the contre-projet, the undersigned stated that they had no authority to grant the first, unless accompanied by a limitation in point of time; and when the American Plenipotentiaries proposed, as a substitute for that article, one which should give the United States the same privileges as the most favored European nations in their intercourse with the British possessions in that quarter, the undersigned, while they admitted that, in some respects, it stood upon different grounds from an article which should grant the indirect voyage to the East Indies, without any equivalent or limitation in point of time, did not feel themselves authorized to hold out any expectation that this new suggestion could be acceded to by Great Britain.

The undersigned request the American Plenipotentiaries to accept the assurances of their high consideration.

The American to the British Plenipotentiaries.

HARLEY STREET, June 21, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the British Plenipotentiaries dated the 20th instant, communicating the substance of the observations which they had made in the conference of the 19th, upon the different points referred to in the note of the undersigned of the 17th instant.

The views of the undersigned, with respect to the second article, being precisely the same with those stated by the British Plenipotentiaries, there will be no difficulty in framing a clause embracing the objects contemplated by both parties, and which shall be free from ambiguity.

The explanation given by the British Plenipotentiaries upon that part of the third article which the undersigned apprehended might be liable to a construction, in reference to the Indian trade, not intended by either party, is perfectly satisfactory. But they regret that they cannot accede to the alterations proposed in other respects by the British Plenipotentiaries to the article which had been offered by the undersigned, particularly as they affect the privilege of inland navigation by the river St. Lawrence and by the waters flowing from Lake Champlain; nor have they found it practicable to frame any article compatible with the different views entertained by the two parties respecting the intercourse between the United States and Canada. They, therefore, recur to the proposal made in their note of the 17th instant, to omit that article altogether, that proposal not having been noticed in the note of the British Plenipotentiaries of the 20th instant.

They make the same offer as to the fifth article of the contre-projet.

And, thirdly, they hereby renew the proposal made verbally in the conference of the 19th inst., to substitute, for the two separate articles, one placing the United States, in their intercourse with the British possessions in India, on the footing of the most favored European nation.

The undersigned request to be made acquainted with the determination of the British Plenipotentiaries on those three propositions.

The undersigned tender again to the British Plenipotentiaries assurances of their distinguished consideration.

The British to the American Plenipotentiaries.

BOARD OF TRADE, June 23, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the American Plenipotentiaries of the 21st instant, and are happy to find that no difficulty exists on either side as to the second article. Upon the subject of the third article, the undersigned regret to learn that the American Plenipotentiaries have not found it practicable to frame any article compatible with the different views entertained by the two parties respecting the intercourse between Canada and the United States; and as the undersigned are equally unable to accede to the proposition made on the part of the United States respecting the navigation of waters lying exclusively within the territories of His Britannic Majesty, they accede to the proposal of omitting the article altogether. They have also no objection to the omission of the fifth article.

In regard to the trade with the British East Indies, the undersigned are not authorized to substitute, for the two separate articles which they had proposed, one which shall put the intercourse of the United States in that quarter upon the footing of the most favored European nation, inasmuch as it would have the practical effect of granting, in another shape, that which the undersigned are instructed to withhold, unless accompanied by a greater limitation of time than they would think it expedient to apply to the other arrangements of the treaty. If, however, the American Plenipotentiaries adhere to their objection to the substance of the two separate articles, as proposed on the part of Great Britain, the undersigned are ready to omit altogether any article upon the subject of the East Indies.

The undersigned are nevertheless disposed to consider the arrangements of the second article (as agreed upon, or understood,) to be of sufficient importance to the mutual interests of Great Britain and the United States, particularly in the common object of securing a free commercial intercourse between the two countries, to induce them readily to sign a treaty or convention for that single purpose, independent of the other points to which the negotiation has referred.

The undersigned are happy, upon this occasion, to renew to the American Plenipotentiaries the assurances of their high consideration.

HARLEY STREET, June 24, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the British Plenipotentiaries of the 23d instant, expressing their assent to the proposal of omitting the third and fifth articles of the contre-projet. To the proposal of omitting, also, altogether, any article upon the subject of the East Indies, and of signing an arrangement embracing all the provisions contained in the second article, the undersigned do not feel themselves authorized to accede. But they offer to sign a convention embracing that article entire, and the first separate article, the whole of which convention shall be limited to the term of four years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications; or they will agree to a convention for the sole purpose of abolishing all discriminating duties on American and British vessels, and their cargoes, in the intercourse between the United States and His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, in the manner contemplated by the second article, and as explained and mutually agreed on in the conferences on that subject, omitting all the other provisions contained in the same article, and which had for object to place the two countries, respectively, on the footing of the most favored nation.

The undersigned request the British Plenipotentiaries to accept the assurances of their distinguished consideration.

BOARD OF TRADE, June 26, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the American Plenipotentiaries of the 24th instant, in which they offer to sign a convention embracing the second article entire, and the first separate article, the whole convention to be limited to the term of four years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications; or to agree to a convention for the sole purpose of abolishing all discriminating duties on American and British vessels, and their cargoes, in the intercourse between the United States and the British territories in Europe, omitting all the other provisions contained in the same article, and which had for object to place the two countries, respectively on the footing of the most favored nation.

As neither of these proposals were contemplated in the instructions with which the undersigned were originally furnished, and which were framed with a view to a less limited arrangement, they have felt themselves under the necessity of referring the last note of the American Plenipotentiaries to the consideration of their Government, and will not fail to communicate the result of that reference as soon as they shall be enabled to do so.

The undersigned are happy to avail themselves of this opportunity of renewing to the American Plenipotentiaries the assurances of their high consideration.

The British to the American Plenipotentiaries.

BOARD OF TRADE, June 29, 1815.

In reference to the note which the undersigned had the honor to address to the American Plenipotentiaries on the 26th instant, they are now instructed to acquaint them that the British Government is ready to agree to a convention for four years, (to be calculated from the date of its signature,) which shall contain the whole of the second article, as proposed by the undersigned, and as explained and mutually agreed upon in their several conferences; and also the first article, relating to the East Indies, as proposed on the part of Great Britain, (the latter article also to be in force for four years from the same date.) The undersigned, in making this communication to the American Plenipotentiaries, feel it to be their duty to state, in the most explicit manner, that although, in the earnest desire of promoting a good understanding between the two countries, the British Government has, at the present time, forborne to insist on making in the body of the treaty any marked distinction between its concession in regard to the East Indies, and its other concessions, for which a stipulated equivalent is obtained, yet that it still considers itself as granting to the United States a privilege, to the East Indies, for which it is entitled to require an equivalent; and the undersigned must, therefore, be distinctly understood as reserving to His Majesty's Government, in any future negotiations, the clear right either of withholding this privilege altogether, after the expiration of four years, or of renewing the grant of it for such equivalents, or subject to such modification, as expediency may seem to require at the time of such future negotiation.

The undersigned request to have the honor of seeing the American Plenipotentiaries on Friday next, the 30th instant, at two o'clock, at the Board of Trade; and avail themselves of this opportunity of again offering the assurances of their high consideration.

the 29th instant, and stating the terms on which their Government is ready to agree to a convention on the subject of the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain.

The undersigned have already, in the conferences which they had the honor to hold with the British Plenipotentiaries, expressed their opinion that the proposed convention, taken altogether, was founded on principles of reciprocity, was equally advantageous to both parties, and contained in itself a fair equivalent for every presumed concession made by either party; but both Governments will undoubtedly have a clear right, after the expiration of four years, of refusing to renew, or of subjecting to modifications, any of the stipulations now agreed on which may appear to either party injurious, or requiring some further equivalent. The same earnest desire of promoting a good understanding between the two countries, which has been expressed on the part of Great Britain, has induced the undersigned to agree to a convention more limited both as to its objects and duration than they had contemplated, with a hope that, in the mean time, its deficiencies may be supplied, and such other provisions may be adopted, as will conduce to mutual convenience, and tend to strengthen the relations of amity and friendship happily restored between the two countries.

The undersigned will have the honor to meet the British Plenipotentiaries this day, and feel pleasure in renewing the assurances of their high consideration.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The Right Hon. F. J. ROBINSON, H. GOULBURN, Esq., and Dr. W. ADAMS.

The undersigned, His Britannic Majesty's Chargé des Affaires in the United States, has the honor to acquaint the American Secretary of State, for the information of the President, that he has received His Royal Highness the Prince Regent's ratification, in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, of the commercial Convention between the two countries, signed at London on the 2d of July; and that he has been authorized and is ready to proceed to the exchange, whenever the ratification on the part of the United States shall have taken place.

In communicating this intelligence, the undersigned has received the Prince Regent's commands, at the same time, to transmit to the Government of the United States the accompanying declaration, explanatory of the intentions of His Majesty's Government in so far as regards the intercourse of vessels belonging to the United States with the island of St. Helena; the existing circumstances of the world having rendered it necessary that that island should, for the present, be excepted from the ports of refreshment enumerated in the third article of the said convention.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity of requesting the American Secretary of State to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

A. ST. JOHN BAKER.

DECLARATION.

The undersigned, His Britannic Majesty's Chargé des Affaires in the United States of America, is commanded by His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, to explain and declare, upon the exchange of the ratifications of the convention concluded at London on the 3d of July of the present year, for regulating the commerce and navigation between the two countries, that, in consequence of events which have happened in Europe subsequent to the signature of the convention aforesaid, it has been deemed expedient, and determined, in conjunction with the allied Sovereigns, that St. Helena shall be the place allotted for the future residence of General Napoleon Bonaparte, under such regulations as may be necessary for the perfect security of his person; and it has been resolved, for that purpose, that all ships and vessels whatever, as well British ships and vessels as others, excepting only ships belonging to the East India Company, shall be excluded from all communication with or approach to that island.

It has, therefore, become impossible to comply with so much of the third article of the treaty as relates to the liberty of touching for refreshment at the island of St. Helena; and the ratifications of the said treaty will be exchanged under the explicit declaration and understanding that the vessels of the United States cannot be allowed to touch at or hold any communication whatever with the said island, so long as the said island shall continue to be the place of residence of the said Napoleon Bonaparte.

Extract of a minute of a conversation which took place at Lord Castlereagh's, between his Lordship and Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, on the 16th of April, 1815.

Lord Castlereagh began by adverting to the unfortunate event which had taken place at Dartmoor, and proposed that, as a statement of the transaction had been received from the American prisoners differing very materially in fact from an inquiry instituted by the port admiral, some means should be devised of procuring information as to the real state of the case; in order either, on the one hand, to satisfy the United States that the lives of their citizens, however unfortunately, had not been wantonly sacrificed, or, on the other, to enable the British Government to punish their civil and military officers, if they should be found to have resorted to measures of extreme severity without necessity, or with too much precipitation. He therefore proposed that one of the American Commissioners should proceed to Dartmoor, with one of the gentlemen with whom they had negotiated at Ghent, and, after examining the persons concerned, and such other evidence as might be thought necessary, should make a joint report upon the facts of the case; that as neither Government could have any wish beyond that of clearing up a transaction which might, if left unexplained, as it now stood, upon ex parte statements, create much irritation between the two countries, so the British Government had no desire to screen any person whose conduct might have been improper or precipitate.

The American Commissioners, agreeing to the principles of Lord Castlereagh's proposition, so far as related to the advantage of having a joint report upon the facts of the case, entertained doubts whether they could, with propriety, take such a duty upon themselves; and suggested that Mr. Beasley, from the situation which he held in this country, appeared to them better qualified for the task. Lord Castlereagh replied, that it was only from a desire of giving to any report which might be made the sanction of the highest authority, that he had suggested the employment of the Commissioners themselves; and, deeming it of the most essential importance to satisfy the public in both countries on this subject, he was induced to prefer his original proposition; but that he must, of course, leave it to the American Commissioners to decide whether Mr. Beasley was better fitted for this service; and that, upon receiving the result of their consideration of the subject, the Government would appoint some person properly qualified to meet the American gentleman who might be so selected; such person being either one of the late British Commissioners at Ghent, or a commissioner of the transport board, according as the American Commissioners might decide upon going themselves or sending Mr. Beasley. Lord Castlereagh then entered upon the immediate release of the American prisoners of war detained in this country. After stating the inconvenience of retaining in confinement men who had a right, under a treaty of peace, to be liberated, he requested information as to whether Mr. Beasley was proceeding in the measures which he understood to have been taken for conveying them back to America.

The American Commissioners stated that Mr. Beasley had certainly taken up some transports, on his own responsibility, previous to the receipt of instructions from America; but the American Government considered the restoration of prisoners to imply their reconveyance to their own country by the Power detaining them; and the American Commissioners did not know whether Mr. Beasley had either authority or funds for continuing the service which he had, on his own view of the subject, commenced.

Lord Castlereagh stated that he saw no objection to adopting some such measure as that which had been adopted in America, and proposed that each party should defray half the expense of conveying the prisoners from this country to America, leaving the ultimate construction of the treaty for future arrangements. But he remarked, that the article on which the doubt had arisen being founded on principles of perfect reciprocity, it appeared to him scarcely consonant with those principles, that the only expense to be defrayed by the United States should be that of conveying the British prisoners from the United States to Bermuda or Halifax, while Great Britain should have not only to convey to America the American prisoners now in this country, but also to bring home from colonies nearly as distant as the United States all her own prisoners.

Extract of a letter from H. Clay and Albert Gallatin, Esquires, to Mr. Beasley.

LONDON, April 18, 1815.

At the request of Lord Castlereagh, we have had interviews with him and Mr. Goulburn, on the subjects of the transportation of the American prisoners now in this country to the United States, and of the late unfortunate event at the depot at Dartmoor.

On the latter subject, as a statement of the transaction has been received from the American prisoners differing very materially in fact from that which had resulted from an inquiry instituted by the port admiral, it has been thought advisable that some means should be devised of procuring information as to the real state of the case, in order, on the one hand, to show that there had not been any wanton or improper sacrifice of the lives of American citizens, or, on the other, to enable the British Government to punish their civil and military officers, if it should appear that they have resorted to measures of extreme severity, without necessity, or with too much precipitation.

Lord Castlereagh proposed that the inquiry should be a joint one, conducted by a commissioner selected by each Government; and we have thought such an inquiry most likely to produce an impartial and satisfactory result.

We presume that you will have too much occupation on the first subject, and the other incidental duties of your office, to attend to this inquiry in person. On that supposition, we have stated to the British Government that we should recommend to you the selection of Charles King, Esq., as a fit person to conduct it in behalf of the American Government. If Mr. King will undertake the business, he will forthwith proceed to Dartmoor, and, in conjunction with the British Commissioner, who may be appointed on the occasion, will examine the persons concerned, and such other evidence as may be thought necessary, and make a joint report upon the facts of the case to J. Q. Adams, Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at this Court, and to the British Government.

The mode of executing this service must be left to the discretion of Mr. King and his colleague. If they can agree upon a narration of the facts, after having heard the evidence, it will be better than reporting the whole mass of testimony in detail, which they may, perhaps, find it necessary to do, if they cannot come to such an agreement.

We are, &c.

H. CLAY.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq., &c.

Mr. Charles King to Mr. Adams.

PLYMOUTH, April 26, 1815.

SIR: In pursuance of instructions received from Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, I have the honor to transmit to you the report prepared by Mr. Larpent and myself, on behalf of our respective Governments, in relation to the unfortunate transaction at Dartmoor prison of war, on the 6th of the present month. Considering it of much importance that the report, whatever it might be, should go forth under our joint signatures, I have forborne to press some of the points which it involves as far as otherwise I might have done; and it therefore may not be improper, in this letter, to enter into some little explanation of such parts of the report. Although it does appear that a part of the prisoners were, on that evening, in such a state and under such circumstances as to have justified, in the view which the commander of the depot could not but take of it, the intervention of the military force, and even in a strict sense the first use of fire-arms, yet I cannot but express it as my settled opinion, that, by a conduct a little more temporising, this dreadful alternative of firing upon the unarmed prisoners might have been avoided. Yet, as this opinion has been the result of subsequent examination, and after having acquired a knowledge of the comparatively harmless state of the prisoners, it may be but fair to consider whether, in such a moment of confusion and alarm as that appears to have been, the officer commanding could have fairly estimated his danger, or have measured out with precision the extent and nature of the force necessary to guard against it. But when the firing became general, as it afterwards appears to have done, and caught with electric rapidity from the square to the platforms, there is no plea nor shadow of excuse for it, except in the personal exasperation of the soldiery; nor for the more deliberate (and, therefore, more unjustifiable) firing which took place into three of the prisons, Nos. 1, 3, and 4, but more particularly into No. 3, after the prisoners had retired into them, and there was no longer any pretence of apprehension as to their escape. Upon this ground, as you, sir, will perceive by the report, Mr. Larpent and myself had no difference in opinion; and I am fully persuaded that my own regret was not greater than his, at perceiving how hopeless would be the attempt to trace to any individual of the military those outrageous proceedings.

As to whether the order to fire came from Captain Shortland, I yet confess myself unable to form any satisfactory opinion, though, perhaps, the bias of my mind is that he did give such an order. But his anxiety and exertions to stop it, after it had continued some little time, are fully proved; and his general conduct, previous to this occurrence, as far as he could with any propriety enter into such details, appears to have been characterized by great fairness, and even kindness, in the relation which he stood towards the prisoners.

On the subject of any complaints existing against their own Government by the prisoners, it was invariably answered, to several distinct questions put by me on that head, that none whatsoever existed, or had been expressed by them, although they confessed themselves to entertain some animosity against Mr. Beasley, to whom they attribute their detention in this country ; with what justice, you, sir, will be better able to judge. They made no complaint whatsoever as to their provisions, and general mode of living and treatment in the prison.

I have transmitted to Mr. Beasley a list of the killed and wounded on this melancholy occasion, with a request that he would forward it to the United States for the information of their friends at home ; and I am pleased to have it in my power to say that the wounded are, for the most part, doing well.

I have also enclosed to Mr. Beasley the notes taken by me of the evidence adduced before us, with a request that he would have them fairly copied, as also a copy of the depositions taken before the coroner, and desired him to submit them to you when in order.

I cannot conclude, sir, without expressing my high sense of the impartiality and manly fairness with which this inquiry has been conducted on the part of Mr. Larpent, nor without mentioning that every facility was afforded to us in its prosecution, as well by the military officers commanding here and at the prison, as by the magistrates of the vicinity. I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

CHARLES KING.

To his Excellency J. Q. ADAMS, &c.

Report of Messrs. Larpent and King upon the occurrence at Dartmoor Prison.

PLYMOUTH, April 26, 1815.

We, the undersigned Commissioners, appointed on behalf of our respective Governments to inquire into and report upon the unfortunate occurrence of the 6th of April instant, at Dartmoor prison, having carefully perused the proceedings of the several courts of inquiry instituted immediately after that event, by the orders of Admiral Sir John T. Duckworth and Major General Brown, respectively, as well as the depositions taken at the coroner's inquest, upon the bodies of the prisoners who lost their lives upon that melancholy occasion ; upon which inquest the jury found a verdict of "justifiable homicide," proceeded immediately to the examination, upon oath, in the presence of one or more of the magistrates of the vicinity, of all the witnesses, both American and English, who offered themselves for the purpose, or who could be discovered as likely to afford any material information on the subject, as well those who had been previously examined before the coroner as otherwise, to the number, in the whole, of above eighty. We further proceeded to a minute examination of the prison, for the purpose of clearing up some points which, upon the evidence alone were scarcely intelligible ; obtaining from the prisoners, and from the officers of the depot, all the necessary assistance and explanation ; and premising that we have been, from necessity, compelled to draw many of our conclusions from statements and evidence highly contradictory. We do now make, upon the whole of the proceedings, the following report :

During the period which has elapsed since the arrival in this country of the account of the ratification of the Treaty of Ghent, an increased degree of restlessness and impatience of confinement appears to have prevailed amongst the American prisoners at Dartmoor, which, though not exhibited in the shape of any violent excesses, has been principally indicated by threats of breaking out, if not soon released. On the 4th of this month, in particular, only two days previous to the event the subject of this inquiry, a large body of the prisoners rushed into the market square, from whence by the regulations of the prison they are excluded, demanding bread instead of biscuit, which had on that day been issued by the officers of the depot. Their demand, however, having been then almost immediately complied with, they returned to their own yards ; and the employment of force, on that occasion, became unnecessary.

On the evening of the 6th, about six o'clock, it was clearly proved to us that a breach or hole had been made in one of the prison walls, sufficient for a full-sized man to pass, and that others had been commenced in the course of the day, near the spot, though never completed ; that a number of the prisoners were over the railing, erected to prevent them from communicating with the sentinels on the walls, which was of course forbidden by the regulations of the prison ; and that, in the space between the railing and those walls, they were tearing up pieces of turf, and wantonly pelting each other in a noisy and disorderly manner ; that a much more considerable number of the prisoners were collected together at that time in one of their yards, near the place where the breach was effected ; and that, although such collection of prisoners was not unusual at other times, (the gambling tables being commonly kept in that part of the yard,) yet, when connected with the circumstances of the breach, and the time of the day, which was after the horn (the signal for the prisoners to retire to their respective prisons) had ceased to sound, it became a natural and just ground of alarm to those who had charge of the depot.

It was also in evidence that, in the building formerly the petty officers' prison, but now the guard barrack, which stands in the yard, to which the hole in the wall would serve as a communication, a part of the arms of the guard who were off duty were usually kept in the racks ; and though there was no evidence that this was, in any respect, the motive which induced the prisoners to make the opening in the wall, or even that they were ever acquainted with the fact, it naturally became at least a further cause for suspicion and alarm, and an additional reason for precaution.

Upon these grounds, Captain Shortland appears to us to have been justified in giving the order (which about this time he seems to have given) to sound the alarm-bell, the usual signal for collecting the officers of the depot, and putting the military on the alert. However reasonable and justifiable this was as a measure of precaution, the effects produced thereby in the prisons (but which could not have been intended) were most unfortunate, and deeply to be regretted. A considerable number of prisoners in the yards where no disturbance existed before, and who were either already within their respective prisons, or quietly retiring as usual towards them, immediately upon sound of the bell rushed back from curiosity, as it appears, towards the gates where, by that time, the crowd had assembled; and many who were at the time absent from their yards, were also, from the plan of the prison, compelled, in order to reach their own homes, to pass by the same spot. And thus, that which was merely a measure of precaution, in its operation increased the evil it was intended to prevent.

Almost at the same instant that the alarm-bell rang, (but whether before or subsequent is, upon the evidence, doubtful, though Captain Shortland states it as one of his further reasons for causing it to ring,) some one or more of the prisoners broke the iron chain which was the only fastening of No. 1 gate, leading into the market square, by means of an iron bar; and a very considerable number of the prisoners immediately rushed towards that gate, and many of them began to press forward, as fast as the opening would permit, into the square.

There was no direct proof before us of previous concert or preparation on the part of the prisoners, and no evidence of their intention or disposition to effect their escape on this occasion, excepting that which arose by inference from the whole of the above detailed circumstances connected together.

The natural and almost irresistible inference to be drawn, however, from the conduct of the prisoners, by Captain Shortland and the military was, that an intention on the part of the prisoners to escape was on the point of being carried into execution, and it was at least certain that they were, by force, passing beyond the limits prescribed to them, at a time when they ought to have been quietly going in for the night.

It was also in evidence that the outer gates of the market square were usually opened about this time to let the bread-wagon pass and repass to the store, although, at the period in question, they were in fact closed.

Under these circumstances, and with these impressions necessarily operating upon his mind, and the knowledge that, if the prisoners once penetrated through the square, the power of escape was almost to a certainty afforded to them, if they should be so disposed, Captain Shortland, in the first instance, proceeded down the square, towards the prisoners, having ordered a part of the different guards, to the number of about fifty only at first, (though they were increased afterwards,) to follow him. For some time both he and Doctor Magrath endeavored, by quiet means and persuasion, to induce the prisoners to retire to their own yards, explaining to them the fatal consequences which must ensue if they refused, as the military would, in that case, be necessarily compelled to employ force. The guard was, by this time, formed in the rear of Captain Shortland, about two-thirds of the way down the square: the latter is about one hundred feet broad, and the guards extended nearly all across. Captain Shortland, finding that persuasion was in vain, and that, although some were induced by it to make an effort to retire, others pressed on in considerable numbers, at last ordered about fifteen file of the guard, nearly in front of the gate which had been forced, to charge the prisoners back to their own yards.

The prisoners were in some places so near the military that one of the soldiers states he could not come fairly to the charge, and the military were unwilling to act as against an enemy. Some of the prisoners, also, were unwilling and reluctant to retire, and some pushing and struggling ensued between the parties, arising partly from intention, but mainly from the pressure of those behind preventing those in front from getting back. After some little time, however, this charge appears to have been so far effective, and that with little or no injury to the prisoners, as to have driven them, for the most part, quite down out the square, with the exception of a small number, who continued their resistance about No. 1 gate.

A great crowd still remained collected after this in the passage between the square and the prisoners' yards, and in the part of these yards in the vicinity of the gates. This assemblage still refused to withdraw, and, according to most of the English witnesses, and some of the American, was making a noise, hallowing, insulting, and provoking, and daring the military to fire; and, according to the evidence of several of the soldiers and some others, was pelting the military with large stones, by which some of them were actually struck. This circumstance is, however, denied by many of the American witnesses; and some of the English, upon having the question put to them, stated that they saw no stones thrown previously to the firing, although their situation at the time was such as to enable them to see most of the proceedings in the square.

Under these circumstances the firing commenced. With regard to any order having been given to fire, the evidence is very contradictory; several of the Americans swear, very positively, that Captain Shortland gave that order; but the manner in which, from the confusion of the moment, they describe this part of the transaction, is so different in its details, that it is difficult to reconcile their testimony. Many of the soldiers, and other English witnesses, heard the word given by some one; but no one of them can swear it was by Captain Shortland, or by any one in particular; and some, amongst whom is the officer commanding the guard, think, if Captain Shortland had given such an order, that they must have heard it, which they did not. In addition to this, Captain Shortland denies the fact; and from the situation in which he appears to have been placed at the time, even according to the American witnesses, in front of the soldiers, it may appear somewhat improbable that he should then have given such an order. But, however it may remain a matter of doubt whether the firing first began in the square by order, or was a spontaneous act of the soldiers themselves, it seems clear that it was continued and renewed both there and elsewhere without orders; and that on the platforms, and in several places about the prison, it was certainly commenced without any authority.

The fact of an order having been given at first, provided the firing was, under the existing circumstances, justifiable, does not appear very material in any other point of view than as showing a want of discipline and self-possession in the troops, if they should have fired without orders.

With regard to the above important consideration of "whether the firing was justifiable or not," we are of opinion, under all the circumstances of the case, from the apprehension which the soldiers might fairly entertain, owing to the number and conduct of the prisoners, that this firing, to a certain extent, was justifiable in a military point of view, in order to intimidate the prisoners, and compel them thereby to desist from all acts of violence, and retire, as they were ordered, from a situation in which the responsibility of the agent and military could not permit them with safety to remain.

From the fact of the crowd being so close, and the firing, at first, being attended with very little injury, it appears probable that a large proportion of the muskets were as stated by one or two of the witnesses, levelled over the heads of the prisoners; a circumstance, in some respects, to be lamented, as it induced them to cry out "blank cartridges," and merely irritated and encouraged them to renew their insults to the soldiery, which produced a repetition of the firing in a manner much more destructive.

The firing in the square having continued for some time, by which several of the prisoners sustained injuries, the greater part of them appear to have been running back with the utmost confusion and precipitation to their respective prisons, and the cause for further firing seems, at this period, to have ceased. It appears, accordingly, that Captain Shortland was in the market square exerting himself and giving orders to that effect, and that Lieutenant Fortye had succeeded in stopping the fire on his part of the guard.

Under these circumstances, it is very difficult to find any justification for the further renewal and continuance of the firing, which certainly took place both in the prison yards and elsewhere, though we have some evidence of subsequent provocation given to the military, and resistance to the turnkeys in shutting the prisons, and of stones being thrown out from within the prison doors.

The subsequent firing appears rather to have arisen from the state of individual irritation and exasperation on the part of the soldiers who followed the prisoners into their yards, and from the absence of nearly all the officers, who might have restrained it, as well as from the great difficulty of putting an end to the firing when once commenced under such circumstances. Captain Shortland was, from this time, busily occupied with the turnkeys in the square, receiving and taking care of the wounded. Ensign White remained with his guard at the breach, and Lieutenants Avelyne and Fortye, the only other subalterns known to have been present, continued in the square with the main bodies of their respective guards.

The time of the day, which was the officers' dinner hour, will, in some measure, explain this, as it caused the absence of every officer from the prison whose presence was not indispensable there. And this circumstance, which has been urged as an argument to prove the intention of the prisoners to take this opportunity to escape, tended to increase the confusion, and to prevent those greater exertions being made which might, perhaps, have obviated at least a portion of the mischief which ensued. At the time that the firing was going on in the square a cross fire was kept up from several of the platforms on the walls round the prison, where the sentries stand, by straggling parties of soldiers, who ran up there for that purpose. As far as this fire was directed to disperse the men assembled round the breach, (for which purpose it was most effectual,) it seems to stand upon the same ground as that in the first instance in the square. But that part which, it is positively sworn, was directed against straggling parties of prisoners running about the yards and endeavoring to enter the few doors which the turnkeys, according to their usual practice, had left open, does seem, as stated, to have been wholly without object or excuse, and to have been a wanton attack upon the lives of defenceless, and, at that time, unoffending individuals.

In the same, or even in more severe terms, we must remark upon what was proved as to the firing into the doorways of the prison, more particularly into that of No. 3 prison, at a time when the men were in crowds at the entrance.

From the position of the prison and of the door, and from the marks of the balls, which were pointed out to us, as well as from the evidence, it was clear this firing must have proceeded from soldiers a very few feet from the door-way; and though it was certainly sworn that the prisoners were at the time of part of the firing, at least, continuing to insult, and occasionally to throw stones at the soldiers, and that they were standing in the way of and impeding the turnkey who was there for the purpose of closing the door, yet still there was nothing stated which could, in our view, at all justify such excessive harsh and severe treatment of helpless and unarmed prisoners, when all idea of escape was at an end.

Under these impressions, we used every endeavor to ascertain if there was the least prospect of identifying any of the soldiers who had been guilty of the particular outrages here alluded to, or of tracing any particular death at that time to the firing of any particular individual, but without success; and all hopes of bringing the offenders to punishment would seem to be at an end.

In conclusion, we, the undersigned, have only to add, that whilst we lament, as we do most deeply, the unfortunate transaction which has been the subject of this inquiry, we find ourselves totally unable to suggest any steps to be taken as to those parts of it which seem most to call for redress and punishment.

CHARLES KING,
FRS. SEYMOUR LARPENT.

Lord Castlereagh to Messrs. Clay and Gallatin.

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 22, 1815.

GENTLEMEN: I lost no time in laying before the Prince Regent the report made by Mr. Larpent and Mr. King, respectively appointed on the part of His Majesty's Government and that of the United States of America, to inquire into the circumstances of the late unfortunate occurrence at Dartmoor prison.

His Royal Highness has commanded me to express, through you, to the Government of America, how deeply he laments the consequences of this unhappy affair.

If any thing can tend to relieve the distress which His Royal Highness feels on this occasion, it is the consideration that the conduct of the soldiers was not actuated by any spirit of animosity against the prisoners, and that the inactivity of the officers may be attributed rather to the inexperience of militia forces, than to any want of zeal or inclination to afford that liberal protection which is ever due to prisoners of war.

But His Royal Highness has observed, at the same time, with sincere regret, that although the firing of the troops upon the prisoners may have been justified at the commencement, by the turbulent conduct of the latter, yet, that as the extent of the calamity must be ascribed to a want of steadiness in the troops, and of exertion in the officers, calling for the most severe animadversion, His Royal Highness has been pleased to direct the commander-in-chief to address to the commanding officer of the Somerset militia his disapprobation of the conduct of the troops, which, it is trusted, will make a due impression on the minds of the officers and men who were engaged in this unfortunate transaction.

As an additional proof of the sentiments which animate the Prince Regent on this occasion, I am further commanded to express His Royal Highness's desire to make a compensation to the widows and families of the sufferers; and I have to request that you, gentlemen, would make this known to your Government, inviting them, at the same time, to co-operate with His Majesty's Chargé des Affaires in the United States in investigating the respective claims, for the purpose of fulfilling His Royal Highness's benevolent intentions upon this painful occasion.

I request that you will accept the assurance of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c.

CASTLEREAGH.

To H. CLAY, and A. GALLATIN, Esqs.
American Commissioners.

Copy of a letter from Messrs. Clay and Gallatin to Lord Castlereagh.

HANOVER STREET, HANOVER SQUARE.

May 24, 1815.

MY LORD: We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's official note of the 22d instant. Having, as we have already informed your Lordship, no powers on the subject to which it refers, we will lose no time in transmitting it to our Government. We will also place in the possession of the American Minister near His Britannic Majesty's Government (whose arrival here we daily expect) a copy of your Lordship's note, together with a statement of what had previously passed respecting the unfortunate event at Dartmoor.

We have the opportunity of tendering, &c.

H. CLAY,
ALBERT GALLATIN.

The Rt. Hon. VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, dated JUNE 23, 1815.

He (Lord Castlereagh) then mentioned the late occurrence at Dartmoor prison, and the measures which had been taken, by agreement, between him and Messrs. Clay and Gallatin on that occasion. I said I had received a copy of the report made by Mr. King and Mr. Larpent, after their examination into the transaction, and of the written depositions that had been taken, as well on that examination as previously, at the coroner's inquest; that, after what had been done, I considered the procedure as so far terminated that I was not aware of any further steps to be taken by me until I should receive the instructions of my Government on the case. From the general impression made on my mind from the evidence that I had perused, I regretted that a regular trial of Captain Shortland had not been ordered, and I thought it probable that such would be the opinion of my Government. He said that undoubtedly there were cases in which a trial was the best remedy to be resorted to, but there were others in which it was the worst; that a trial, the result of which would be an acquittal, would place the whole affair in a more unpleasant situation than it would be without it; that the evidence was extremely contradictory; that it had been found impossible to trace to any individual the most unjustifiable part of the firing; and that Captain Shortland denied having given the order to fire. I admitted that the evidence was contradictory, but said that from the impression of the whole mass of it upon me, I could not doubt either that Captain Shortland gave the order to fire, or that, under the circumstances of the case, it was unnecessary. It was true, the result of a trial might be an acquittal; but as it was the regular remedy for a case of this description, the substitution of any other was susceptible of strong objections, and left the officer apparently justified, when I could not but consider his conduct as altogether unjustifiable.

Mr. Baker, His Britannic Majesty's Chargé des Affaires, to the Secretary of State, PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 3, 1815.

SIR: In a communication made by Viscount Castlereagh, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, on the 20th of last May, relative to the unfortunate occurrence at Dartmoor prison, his Lordship expressed to those gentlemen, by the command of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, how deeply His Royal Highness lamented the consequences of that unhappy affair, and that, if anything could have alleviated the distress which His Royal Highness felt on that occasion, it was the consideration that the conduct of the soldiers was to be attributed rather to the inexperience of a militia force, than to any want of zeal or inclination to afford that liberal protection which is ever due to prisoners of war. His Lordship likewise informed them that, although the firing appeared to have been justified at its commencement, by the turbulent conduct of the prisoners, yet, that as the extent of the calamity was to be ascribed to a want of steadiness in the troops, and of exertion in the officers, calling for the most severe animadversion, His Royal Highness has been pleased to direct the commander-in-chief to address to the commanding officer of the Somerset militia his disapprobation of the conduct of the troops, so that a due impression might be made on the minds of the officers and men engaged in that unfortunate transaction.

As an additional proof of the sentiments which animated the Prince Regent on this painful occasion, his Lordship was also further commanded to express to Messrs. Clay and Gallatin His Royal Highness's desire to make a compensation to the widows and families of the sufferers.

In reiterating these sentiments on the part of His Majesty's Government, for the information of the President of the United States, I have the honor to acquaint you, that I have been directed to concert with the American Government the most efficient means of carrying into execution these benevolent intentions of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and shall be ready, with a view of expediting the arrangements to be made, to proceed without delay to Washington, for the purpose of communicating with you personally on the subject, should it suit your convenience to meet me there. I beg leave, at the same time, to suggest, as a necessary preliminary to any measures which may be adopted, that information should be procured from the different States with respect to the families of the sufferers, and any other circumstances which may facilitate the completion of the arrangements alluded to.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of State to A. St. John Baker, Esq., His Britannic Majesty's Chargé des Affaires.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11, 1815.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 3d of August, communicating a proposition of your Government to make provision for the widows and families of the sufferers in the much-to-be-lamented occurrence at Dartmoor.

It is painful to touch on this unfortunate event, from the deep distress it has caused to the whole American people. This repugnance is increased by the consideration that our Governments, though penetrated with regret, do not agree in sentiment respecting the conduct of the parties engaged in it.

Whilst the President declines accepting the provisions contemplated by His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, he nevertheless does full justice to the motives which dictated it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

DEVON, to wit:

Informations of witnesses severally taken and acknowledged on behalf of our Sovereign Lord the King, touching the death of John Haywood, at the prison of war at Dartmoor, in the parish of Lidford, in the county of Devon, the eighth day of April, in the fifty-fifth year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord King George III., before Joseph Whiteford, gentleman, one of the coroners of his said Majesty for the said county, on an inquisition then and there taken on view of the body of the said John Haywood, then and there lying dead, as follows:

Thomas Edwards, a private soldier in His Majesty's first regiment of Somerset militia, on his oath, saith: That he is stationed with the said regiment at the barracks at Dartmoor, adjoining the prison of war there; that, on Thursday last, the sixth day of this present month of April, he was on the guard called the West piquet guard, and, at the hour of half-past six in the evening, was fixed as sentinel in what is called the barrack yard, which is situated within the walls of the prison, but the yard allotted to the prisoners is separated from the barrack yard by a stone wall; that about the hour of seven in the evening of same day, he (this informant) was near his post, when he heard a noise, as if some persons on the other side of the wall were attempting to undermine it; whereupon he went to that part of the wall from whence the noise proceeded, and, on looking at the wall, he perceived that the mortar between the stones was moving, at the height of between three and four feet from the ground; whereupon this informant immediately went to the corner of a building which is called the cook-house, and alarmed the sentinel nearest to this informant on the wall, and desired him to order the piquet out; that this informant then returned to the spot where he had seen the mortar moving, and by this time there was a hole made through the wall large enough for this informant to put his musket and bayonet through, and, on looking through the hole in the wall, he saw a great number of the prisoners, he believes to the number of three or four hundred, assembled together near the hole in the wall; and he thinks that there were altogether upwards of one thousand assembled nearly around the same place; that this informant spoke to the prisoners through the wall, and ordered them off several times, but many of the prisoners declared that they would not go, and they still continued beating against the wall; and this informant observed that one of the prisoners had an iron bar in his hand, with which he was tearing down the wall, and the prisoners within the prison were at this time hallooing and making a great noise; that the prisoners continued beating against the wall until they had made a hole in it large enough for the largest man in the prison to pass through, when this informant cocked his musket and presented it to the prisoners, threatening to fire at them unless they desisted; when the prisoners abused this informant, asked him why he did not fire, and said he was afraid to do so, and they still continued tearing down the wall of the prison; that shortly after the piquet guard came to this informant's assistance, and then this informant left that part of the wall and went to his post; that Lieutenant White, of the same regiment, commanded the piquet guard, and this informant heard him order the prisoners to go from the wall, but they refused to do so, and still continued tearing down the wall; that some of the men of the piquet guard threatened to fire at the prisoners, but Lieutenant White told them that they should not fire, and remained in the barrack yard with his party, where the hole was; that, about half-past seven o'clock, whilst this informant was at his post, he heard the report of several muskets in the direction of the market place, but did not leave his post; and at this time the prisoners were still beating against the wall on the inside, at several different places, but after many muskets had been discharged they quitted the wall; that this informant remained at his post until he was relieved at half-past eight o'clock, and during this time no musket was fired in the barrack yard; and after this informant was relieved he did not hear the report of any muskets, and the firing had entirely ceased; and this informant further saith, that he was not within the walls of the prison, and did not see any musket discharged, but only heard the report of them.

THOMAS EDWARDS.

Sworn before me,

JOSEPH WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Samuel White, a lieutenant in His Majesty's regiment of first Somerset militia, on his oath, saith: That, on Thursday last, the 6th day of the present month, (April,) he (this informant) had the west guard of the prison of war at Dartmoor, and about half past six o'clock in the evening he was in the guard room, when, in consequence of some information he received, he ordered out the guard, and proceeded with it to the barrack yard, which adjoins that part of the prison distinguished by No. 7, and is separated therefrom by a stone wall; that Charles Edwards, now present, was then a sentinel in the barrack yard, and at his post, and at the distance of about fifteen yards from the post where he was the sentinel, he (this informant) observed a hole in the wall which separated the barrack yard from the prison, large enough for a man of any size to come through; that at this time there were a great number of prisoners within the wall near the hole, and several of them tearing down the wall, and he particularly noticed two of the prisoners with iron bars in their hands, removing the stones from the wall; that this informant spoke to the prisoners repeatedly, and desired them to desist from what they were about, and told them that, unless they did, the whole of the military would be called out, and obliged to commit violence to compel them to desist: but the prisoners still continued tearing down the wall, and repeated volleys of turf and stones were thrown through the opening the prisoners had made in the wall, and over it, at this informant and the guard; and this informant was struck by some of the mortar and stones taken from the wall, and thrown at him by the prisoners, and several of the men complained of having been also struck with the stones thrown; that this informant did not see Captain Shortland, the agent for the prisoners of war, in the barrack yard, after this informant came; that when this informant spoke to the prisoners who were about the wall, they abused this informant and the guard, declared they would not leave the spot, and said "fire, fire!" that the prisoners within the walls of the prison were, throughout, in a state of disturbance, and whilst some of them were tearing down the wall, the rest were huzzaing and making a great noise, and at this time it was about the hour in the evening when the prisoners are usually locked up in their different prisons; that he (this informant) had been in the barrack yard about fifteen minutes when he heard the prisoners huzzaing and making a great noise adjoining the yard where the market is held, which is the principal entrance to the prison, and at the same time he heard the alarm bell ring, and the drum beat to arms, and immediately after he heard the report of a single musket, which proceeded as in a direction from the prison gates leading into the market place, and this informant then proceeded towards the market place, to ascertain by whose orders the firing had commenced, leaving the piquet guard under the care of the sergeants; and in his way to the market place he heard several other muskets discharged in the same direction as the former, whereupon he immediately returned to his guard, without going to the market place, and still found the prisoners tearing down the wall between the prison and the barrack yard, endeavoring to widen the breach; that the prisoners continued tearing down the wall, when some muskets were fired from the walls by the sentinels towards the place where the breach was; whereupon the number of prisoners near the breach lessened considerably, many running towards their respective prisons, and others towards the principal gate; that some of the prisoners attempted to force their way through the breach, when he (this informant) ordered the guard to charge, and warned the prisoners against the consequences that would follow; that this informant was at this time at the breach in the wall, and part of his body was through, to see what was passing within the walls, and he then observed that the principal rush of the prisoners was towards the main gate, leading to the market place; and just at this moment he (this informant) heard a volley of musketry discharged in the market place, and immediately after the prisoners began to retreat; and shortly after, this informant saw the guard, and the rest of the soldiers who were not on guard, pass on the inside of the prison wall, opposite the breach, and they were drawn up in front of the prison No. 7, and Major Jolliff was persuading the prisoners to go to their prisons, but many of them remained at the prison door, abusing the military; that after a considerable effort on the part of the guard, the prisoners were driven into No. 7 prison, and the door locked; that at the time this informant heard the volley of musketry in the market place, or immediately after, there were several muskets fired from the different platforms where the sentinels were placed, but the firing ceased instantly after the soldiers entered the prison yard; that this informant remained with the guard until half-past eight o'clock at night, when everything was reported to be quiet, when, by order of the field officer, the guard was returned to the guard-room; that there was not a musket discharged in the barrack yard, and he (this informant) saw no person killed or wounded; that when this informant saw the prisoners rush towards the gates, they were in a very riotous, disorderly state, and they appeared to this informant as if determined to force their passage through the gateway; that the soldiers on guard are directed to refrain from any communication with the prisoners, to prevent the prisoners from getting over the iron railing within the walls of the prison, and likewise to prevent the prisoners from tearing down or undermining the walls; that in case the prisoners do not desist from such practices when spoken to, the guard is to be alarmed, but the sentinels are ordered not to fire unless in cases of absolute necessity, or where a prisoner or prisoners is or are in the act of escaping from the prison; that on the 4th day of April instant this informant was also on the guard, and the prisoners were then very disorderly, and refused to obey the commands, insomuch that the guards were turned out, the alarm-bell rung, and the drums beat to arms; and at this time, which was about seven o'clock in the evening, the prisoners had forced the gates of the prison, and had the possession of the whole of the market place, and their demand was then for bread instead of biscuit, which this informant understood had been offered them instead of bread, there being much biscuit in store; but on the 6th day of April instant he did not hear the prisoners assign any cause for their conduct. And this informant further saith, that on the 7th day of April instant he attended Admiral Sir Josias Rowley and Captain Schornberg to the walls of the prison, and heard the Admiral speak to the prisoners from the platform at the main gates, opposite the prison No. 7, and requested to know their grievances, and why the breaches had been made in the wall, and the gates forced; when one of the prisoners, whom this informant understood to be one of the committee, said, in reply to the Admiral, that there was no cause of complaint, and that the breach made in the wall was to get a ball which had been thrown over the wall by some of the boys; that the prisoner said that the chain at the gates was not sufficiently strong, and the press at the gates was so strong, that the gates were forced open, and one or two hundred rushed out, but that there was no intention to escape; that when this informant saw the prisoners breaking down the wall on the 6th day of April, instant, the persons employed about it were all men, and they were all the time abusing the military; and during the time this informant was in the barrack yard, no person asked for a ball, or said a ball had been thrown over the wall.

SAM. WHITE,

Lieut. 1st Somerset reg't militia.

Sworn before me,

JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

John Mitchell, one of the clerks in the office of Thomas George Shortland, Esq., the agent for prisoners of war at Dartmoor, in the parish of Lidford, in the county of Devon, on his oath, saith: That, on Thursday, the sixth day of April instant, about a quarter before seven in the evening, he (this informant) was in his own room, the duty of the day having been finished, except receiving the evening report, when one of the turnkeys, called Richard Arnold, came to this informant's room, and, in consequence of information which he gave, this informant walked towards the south guard, accompanied by Mr. John Bennett, store clerk at the prison, and observed the officer of the guard on the platform; and this informant went on the platform, and saw a great number of prisoners between the iron railing within the walls of the prison and the wall of the military way, which is a place where the prisoners are not permitted to go, and the prisoners were throwing peat and other light articles; that this informant then went to the guard room, where there was a report that a breach had been made by the prisoners in the hospital wall, where he immediately went, but saw no appearance of breach there. That he then returned to the lodge, and, finding that the west guard were not at their post, he went to the north guard and requested the sergeant to assemble his guard, and they followed this informant to the station of the west guard; that this informant then went to the front of the principal entrance to the prison, and saw Captain Shortland in the front of the prison, and the gate of the prison nearest to the hospital was open, and the prisoners were coming through the gates of the prison, towards the upper gates, in a body, at a quick pace, making a great noise, and using the word "keeno," which this informant has frequently heard the prisoners use when they were bent on anything; that Captain Shortland ad vanced towards the prisoners, calling on the guard to follow, form, and be steady, and directed them to keep possession of the market square; that this informant followed Captain Shortland, keeping between him and the military, and this informant heard Captain Shortland desire the prisoners to return quietly to their prisons, for fear of any unpleasant consequences, and he repeatedly urged the prisoners to return to their prison, but they still continued advancing, speaking in a riotous manner, and making a great noise; and at this moment he (this informant) also saw the surgeon, Dr. Magrath, speaking to the prisoners, and he heard him persuade the prisoners to return; that, at this time, he (this informant) observed a large body of prisoners assembled at the other gate, or the opposite side of the market place, and proceeded towards this gate with an intention of observing their conduct minutely, but, on hearing a noise on his left, he turned round and observed the prisoners were much further up the square, more numerous, and part of the guards had charged their bayonets towards the prisoners to force them down, and almost at the same moment he (this informant) heard the report of a musket discharged, and the sound came from where the guard were charged to force the prisoners down, but this informant did not see any person fall; that he (this informant) ran and got in the rear of the military, and almost instantly a discharge of musketry took place from the guards who were forcing the prisoners down, and shortly after he heard various discharges of musketry from different parts of the prison; that he (this informant) did not hear any person give orders to fire; that several muskets were fired in the market square, but what number he cannot say, and, immediately after the firing had ceased, he heard Captain Shortland call for turnkeys to take up the wounded; that this informant made his way through the military with some of the turnkeys, and the first person he saw was a black man lying on the ground, on his face, apparently dead; and there was another man wounded in the square, and sitting in the sentry box, but this informant did not notice any other; that there was then an outcry from the military for the key of the gate which leads to Nos. 5 and 7 prisons, and this informant went and procured a turnkey, who brought the key and opened the gate; and, after some of the military has passed in, this informant went inside the gate, and there saw a white man lying on the ground, also apparently dead; and at this time this informant heard the report of several single muskets, at different parts of the prison, apparently as if from the walls, and, considering it unsafe, he retired behind the military, and went again to the lodge, where he remained until there was a call for turnkeys to shut up the prison, when he procured the necessary turnkeys and sent them down, and then went towards the military himself, and, at Captain Shortland's request, went to ascertain the number of prisoners who had been sent up, and afterwards, by order of Captain Shortland, went to the surgery ward of the hospital to receive the wounded and ascertain their number, and whilst there he received thirty-four prisoners, who were wounded, and one dead man was also brought to the hospital by mistake; that this informant remained there until he was sent for by Captain Shortland to report the number; that, at the time the first musket was fired, he thinks that there were about five hundred prisoners in the market square, and the foremost of them were behaving in a very riotous and disorderly manner, quite disrespectful to Captain Shortland, and without appearing to pay the least attention to what Captain Shortland or Dr. Magrath were saying, and though requested to retire they continued to advance, and seemed to this informant as if determined to force their way to the upper gates, which were then opened to permit the bread-wagon to go out; that, since the 26th day of March last, there has been much dissatisfaction among the prisoners in the prison towards Mr. Beasley, the American agent, whom the prisoners understood was appointed to send them home; and, on the 4th day of April instant, about seven o'clock in the evening, the prisoners got open the gates leading to the market square, and came up and occupied the square until about ten o'clock, when they retired to their respective prisons; that this informant went to the gates and spoke to some of the prisoners, and also went inside amongst them, and asked what they came up for, when they replied it was because they had had no bread that day; that the transport board had permitted the contractor to issue biscuit, of which he had a store, for his contract, and it was arranged by Captain Shortland that they were to have it only one day in a week, and the prisoners had been offered their rations of biscuit, which was one pound of biscuit instead of one pound and a half of soft bread, but they had refused to accept it throughout the day, but remained quiet till the evening; that, on the 6th day of April instant, soft bread had been issued to the prisoners as usual, and Captain Shortland had, on the 5th, communicated to the committee for the prisoners that he did not intend to issue any biscuit without further directions from the board; that this informant did not observe anything thrown by the prisoners at the military on the evening of the 6th, and did not see the prisoners armed with any offensive weapons; that if the prisoners had forced their way to the upper gate of the market square, there would have been no obstacle to their getting out of the prison, as all the gates were open; that about a quarter of an hour previous to this informant seeing the prisoners coming in a body through the gate, the usual horn, the signal for their retiring to their respective prisons, had been blown, and continued to blow nearly the whole of the time.

market square, adjoining to the wall of the military hospital; that just before seven o'clock in the evening this informant went on the platform in the front of the gates of the prison leading into the market square, when he saw a great number of prisoners between the iron railing and the military wall which separates the military way from the prison, and went and reported the circumstance to Mr. Mitchell, and from thence went to Mr. Holmden, the clerk of the agent at the prison, and then this informant returned towards the lodge, and there met Mr. Holmden with a guard, and he went into the prison with them to turn the prisoners from between the railing and the wall, and this informant went to the lower gate again; that, just as this informant got to the gate, he heard a sentinel call from the barrack yard to a sentinel on the platform near the market square, that the prisoners were breaking a hole through the barrack wall, and desiring him to call the guard; that this informant immediately went to the west guard and called them, and when the guard was turned out Captain Shortland came through the lodge, and went with the guard to the barrack yard, and this informant went there also, after having called the north and south guard to be in readiness if they were wanted; that on coming into the barrack yard he observed a hole in the wall on the south side of the cook room, large enough for a man to creep through, and he saw a great number of prisoners through the hole in the wall, who were abusing the soldiers and the captain; that this informant then returned to the market square, leaving Captain Shortland in the barrack yard, and the horn was then sounding for the prisoners to turn into their respective prisons, when he observed a large body of prisoners collected between the iron railing in the front of the prisons, and they were attempting to force the gates, which were locked and secured by an iron chain, and were very riotous; that this informant went away to call the guard, and met Captain Shortland at the upper gate; that the guard was outside by the guard house, drawn out, and Captain Shortland called to them to follow him, and this informant returned with him, and by this time the prisoners had forced the gate, and many hundreds had assembled in the market square; that Captain Shortland desired the soldiers to draw up, be steady, and keep their ground, and the soldiers formed just across the square; that this informant saw Captain Shortland go up in front of the military, and heard him desire the prisoners to go in, or otherwise he should be obliged to use means which he should be very sorry for; that the prisoners were very riotous, calling out "keeno, keeno," several times, and advanced instead of retiring, when some of the soldiers came to a charge, and this informant made the best of his way to get in their rear, and just after he got in the rear he heard a single musket, and soon after he heard several muskets discharged, but the muskets were at first elevated so high that he does not think a single shot touched either of the prisoners, and then he observed that many of the prisoners had got a great way in the yard, when some of them called out "Fire, you buggers, you have no shot in your pieces or guns;" when the military fired again, and this informant heard a cry amongst the prisoners, and almost immediately he heard Captain Shortland call for the turnkeys to help the wounded away; that this informant saw one man dead in the gateway of prison No. 7, and saw several men carried towards the hospital wounded, but he does not know any of them; that this informant did not hear any person give orders to fire; that he was near to Captain Shortland when the firing first began, and, if Captain Shortland had given any orders to fire, he thinks he must have heard them; that between the first discharge and the second the prisoners had retreated from the market square towards the prison, but had made a stand when the second firing commenced; that he did not see the prisoners armed with any offensive weapons, nor did he see them throw any stones at the military; that the same evening, after the prisoners were locked up, he went into the prison yard, and saw several places in the wall where the stoues had been taken out, but there was only one hole entirely through the wall.

Stephen Hall, one of the turnkeys at the prison of war at Dartmoor, on his oath, saith: That on the 6th day of April instant, about a quarter before seven o'clock in the evening, he went into the market square, and went to the lower gate, when he saw some of the prisoners come over in a body from the wall which separates the barrack yard from the prison, and they came to the gate next to the hospital, and forced the gate open, and went up towards the market square; that this informant was close by Captain Shortland in the square, and heard the captain desire them to go back, but they said they would not; that there were some soldiers at this time formed in the market square, and when the prisoners refused to retire they came to a charge, and then this informant went to the rear, when he heard a single musket fire; and at this time he had not heard any person give orders to fire, nor did he hear any such orders given afterwards; that after the musket was fired he went towards the lodge, and heard several muskets fired, and shortly after he heard the captain call for the turnkeys to bring up the wounded, when this informant went down and assisted in taking up two wounded men, one of them in the market square and the other in the prison, and he also picked up one man dead in the market square, but he does not know the man; that when this informant saw the prisoners coming across the yard towards the gate, they were behaving in a very riotous manner, and this informant observed that they had some iron bars, and he thinks that three of the men had an iron bar each; that he did not see either of the men attempt to strike with them, and he did not see either of the prisoners throw anything towards the military ; that this informant heard the alarm bell ring just before he saw the prisoners come across the prison and force the gate ; that after they had forced the gate this informant persuaded the prisoners to go back, but they refused to do so ; that they made no complaints whatever in this informant's hearing ; that on the 7th day of April instant, he was at the lower gate, when he heard some persons who were walking between the railing, and they were talking about a black man that was killed ; and this informant heard the prisoners say, if the black man had not been killed he would have killed Captain Shortland, and that he had a knife in his pocket prepared to stab him ; that there was no person present with this informant at the time he heard this conversation, and he does not know the prisoners who were talking together.

Richard Cephus, an American prisoner of war, on his oath, saith : That he hath this day seen the bodies of several men lying dead at the dead-house in the hospital at Dartmoor, and amongst them he saw the body of John Haywood, a black man ; that John Haywood was in prison No. 4, with this informant, and on Thursday last, about half past five in the evening, he went to the privy adjoining to prison No. 4, and had not been there above a few minutes when he heard a firing of musketry as from the market square and the ramparts around the prison ; that at first there was a single musket which he heard the report of, and immediately after several volleys were fired ; that about six o'clock he came out of the privy and then saw John Haywood going down to go out of the prison, and asked him where he was going ; he said he was going out to see what the firing was about, and parted from this informant ; that this informant went back to the privy, and about ten minutes after he heard that Haywood was dead, but did not see him till this day ; that this informant was not out in the prison yard from four o'clock in the afternoon of the 6th day of April instant until the following day about half past eight in the morning.

Sworn before me,

George Magrath, surgeon at the hospital at the prison of war at Dartmoor, on his oath, saith : That, on the 6th day of April instant, about ten minutes before seven o'clock in the evening, whilst sitting in his own house, he heard the alarm bell ring on the outside of the prison, and immediately ran out, and, on arriving at that part of the military way which fronts the market square, he saw a line of soldiers drawn up on the outside of the square fronting the outer gate ; that, on looking into the square, he observed a considerable body of the prisoners advancing up the square, and, having understood that the prisoners were breaking out, this informant, with as much haste as he could, advanced towards them ;

as soon as this informant got amongst them, he began to exhort them to return quietly into the prison, and told them that he feared any attempt of that kind (meaning an attempt to escape) would be attended with serious consequences ; that many of the prisoners told this informant that they were kept an unnecessary length of time in prison after they considered themselves as free, or some words to that effect ; that this informant observed to them that their detention appeared to be entirely the fault of their own agent, Mr. Beasley ; and several of those whom this informant had addressed, appearing to be sensible of the truth of what this informant had advanced, went back and retired towards the gate leading into the prison from the market square ; that this informant continued to address himself to others, and, whilst expostulating with them, this informant saw the soldiers march down the square and form in a line fronting the prisoners, about the middle of the square, and, during this time, greater numbers of the prisoners were pressing up through the gate ; and whilst this informant was still using language to those whom he addressed, calculated to induce them to return into prison, he heard a voice (but whose it was this informant did not know) ordering the soldiers to charge ; that, at this time, Captain Shortland was near to this informant, and he appeared to be employing the same means as he (this informant) was to induce the prisoners to return to the prison ; that, on hearing the word "charge" given, he looked round, (for his back was then to the soldiers, and his face towards the prison,) and found himself on the point of the soldiers' bayonets, who were close to him ; that he (this informant) was driven a considerable way, at the point of the bayonet, with the prisoners, when he found it necessary to make some attempt to extricate himself, and succeeded in getting round the left wing, which rested on the wall which separates the market square from the hospital, and, whilst this informant was endeavoring to get round, the firing commenced ; at first he heard two or three muskets, but afterwards the discharges became more frequent, and almost amounted to a volley ; that as soon as this informant had extricated himself, being apprehensive that his assistance might be required, in consequence of the firing, he went to make preparation for the purpose ; that this informant went to his own house and carried some instruments to the receiving room of the hospital, where he awaited the arrival of some wounded men, but he did not see any of those who were killed on the spot until this morning ; that this informant has this day examined the body of a black man, stated to be called John Haywood, and found that the ball had entered a little posterior to the acremien of the left shoulder ; passing obliquely upwards, it made its egress about the middle of the right side of the neck, and, in the judgment of this informant, he died of that wound, which appeared to have been inflicted by a musket ball ; that this informant, at the time the order was given to charge, was in warm conversation with the prisoners, and, therefore, cannot take upon himself to say who gave the order, but this informant heard no person give an order to fire; that there was a great deal of confusion among the prisoners, and, therefore, he cannot speak to the general conduct of the prisoners; but those to whom this informant spoke appeared disposed to listen to him, and many receded towards the gate amongst those with whom this informant had been conversing; that the number of the prisoners that were assembled in the market square he cannot say, or even form an estimate, but there was a considerable crowd together, and, during the time this informant was in conversation with the men, they were pressing forward in a body; that, as the whole of this informant's attention was engrossed with a few to whom this informant addressed himself, he cannot take upon himself to give any opinion as to the necessity of coercion; but this informant is of opinion that the prisoners ought not to have been in that situation at so late an hour in the evening; that there was a great clamor of voice, and a general murmur among the prisoners, but this informant did not observe them proceed to any acts of violence before he came away; that, after he came away, and in going to his own house, and from thence to the hospital, he heard the discharge of musketry; and this informant's attention was not attracted to it above two or three minutes, but whether it continued beyond that time he cannot say.

GEORGE MAGRATH.

Sworn before me,

John Odiorne, a citizen of the United States of America, on his oath, saith: That he has been at the prison of war at Dartmoor ever since the 29th day of September last: that, on Thursday last, the 6th day of April instant, a little after six o'clock in the evening, he was at the store in market square, standing by the door, and the wagon with the bread for the prisoners was partly unladen, when this informant heard some person talking loud at the gate at the upper end, and went around the wagon to see who it was, and saw Captain Shortland advancing into the yard, and he was giving his orders to the turnkeys at the lodge in a loud voice; and Richard Arnold spoke to him, and told him something about the wall, when Captain Shortland said, "Damn you, why did not you tell me about it before? ring the bell; call the guards out:" that the guard immediately followed Captain Shortland into the yard, when he ordered them to form across the yard, about two-thirds of the way down; that there were not soldiers enough to stretch across the yard, and they formed with their right on the southern wall, leaving some distance between their left and the northern wall: that Captain Shortland used some harsh expressions to the guard, and bade them form on the northern wall, for that was the place where the prisoners were coming; and just as Captain Shortland gave the orders, this informant saw the prisoners force the gate No. 1, which adjoins the hospital wall; and before this time this informant had not seen a single prisoner in the market square, except those who were employed with him: that there could not have been a body of men in the square without the informant's seeing them, as at this time he was on the steps, at the store, which is about ten feet high, and commands a complete view of the square; that, after the prisoners had advanced to the distance of between twenty-five and thirty feet, Captain Shortland then ordered the men to charge upon them, and the soldiers charged upon the prisoners, when they retreated into the yard, leaving one man behind, who appeared to this informant to have fallen down, and a soldier was standing over him with a bayonet, threatening to stab him if he did not get up; and the man on the ground appeared to be drunk, but this informant could not hear what he said; that, after the prisoners had retreated within the prison, this informant saw an officer put his hand to the gate which opened against the hospital wall, as this informant thought to shut the gate; but instead of shutting it he retreated to the soldiers, at a little distance from the gate, when he heard an order given to fire by Captain Shortland, as the informant supposed, for he was looking directly at him; that the order was not instantly complied with as soon as a musket might have been fired; but in a few seconds a musket was fired by a person at the right of Captain Shortland, a few paces in advance of the others, and immediately after two muskets were fired to the left of Captain Shortland, by the hospital wall, after that there was a general discharge; and immediately after the general discharge a party of soldiers marched to No. 1 yard, through the gate, and fired a volley, and then wheeled about and returned into the square; and after the soldiers had returned into the square, and formed into a line, the officer ordered them to fire, and immediately the whole line across the square fired into the yard; after which the line broke up and advanced into the yard, and this informant could not see any further, but he heard the report of guns in the yard; that, soon after, this informant saw a prisoner coming out of the yard, bringing a prisoner on his back, and a corporal or sergeant spoke to the man, abused him, called him a coward, and said, "this comes of your keeno:" that this informant spoke to the sergeant or corporal, and abused him for having spoken so to the wounded man; but by the advice of Mr. John Arnold he went into the store, and remained there all night: that, about forty minutes, or forty-five, before he saw Captain Shortland, he was in No. 7 prison yard, and he did not perceive there was anything the matter; there was a great crowd round the gambling tables, as usual, but he was not near the place where this informant has seen the holes mended in the wall: that he saw a small hole in the wall the day before, about six or seven inches in depth, and, on inquiring what it was done for, some person said it was done to make quoits with: that this informant never heard that the hole was made for boys to go out and fetch their balls. And this informant further saith that he did not see Dr. Magrath in the square addressing the prisoners, nor did he see him either go in or out.

JOHN ODIORNE.

Sworn before me,

Addison Holmes, a citizen of the United States of America, on his oath, saith : That on Thursday, the 6th day of this present month of April, between the hours of five and six o'clock in the evening, he was at the lower part of the yard of the prison No. 3, and, understanding that a hole had been broken through the wall in the prison No. 7, by the boys, to get at their balls, he was going to see it; and hearing the alarm-bell rung, he went into the market square, having found the gate open, and there were about a dozen prisoners in the square, and a great many more followed after him; he was going up to see what the alarm-bell was rung for, when he saw the troops entering the outer gate of the square, and Captain Shortland was with them: that, as the troops came through the gate, they were paraded across the square; and this informant saw Dr. Magrath at the left of the troops, talking to about a dozen of the prisoners, advising them to go down to the prison quietly; and some of them turned and went towards the gate, but others were talking with him still: that at this time there was a considerable body of prisoners in the rear: that Captain Shortland was in front of the troops, and about the middle of them, speaking to one man, who wanted to say something to him; but it appeared that the captain would have no conversation with him, and pushed him from him twice, when the man turned about and was going down slowly: that the captain then turned round and ordered the troops to charge their bayonets, twice; but they did not do so until they were ordered by one of their own officers, and then the troops charged their bayonets and the prisoners were forced on before them, and Dr. Magrath, being in front, stepped in between two bayonets, and got to the rear: that this informant stepped aside, and got between two sentry boxes, and the troops passed him; and by this time the prisoners were forced to the gate, had got inside the prison, and shut the gate after them; but Captain Shortland, who was in front of the troops, shoved the gate open, and this informant, thinking it was a good opportunity for him to get in, pushed on between two men, and then saw that Captain Shortland had hold of a musket, and immediately that musket was discharged; but whether Captain Shortland pulled the trigger or not, this informant does not know; and immediately after, there was firing at the left: that Captain Shortland had ordered the troops to fire before he took hold of the musket, but he was not obeyed, and then took hold of the musket, and he believes the soldier had hold of it at the same time: that just after the firing at the left, as he (this informant) was passing between two men, one of whom had discharged his musket, this man was hauling his musket back to stab this informant, and before he drew it past this informant, he (this informant) unshipped the bayonet and threw it on the ground, and then pushed off the bayonet on the left with his arm, and got in round the gate, when the soldiers immediately fired another round, and he saw a man fall: that this informant stopped a few minutes, and the soldiers fired several rounds, and this informant went round the prison No. 1, to the prison No. 3, and the soldiers were firing from the walls up the prison: that this informant got into the prison No. 3, when two rounds were fired into the prison door, which killed one man and wounded another; but who it was that was killed he does not know: that directly after this the prison doors were shut, and he heard no more of it: that he cannot say what was doing in the yard of prison No. 7, as he was not there; but the prisoners in the yard of prison No. 3 were walking the yard quietly, it being just before the time of turning in when he heard the alarm-bell.

ADDISON HOLMES.

Sworn before me,

JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

John Arnold, steward of the prisoners in health at the prison of war at Dartmoor, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of April instant, about seven o'clock in the evening, he was at the door of the contractor's store in the market square, receiving bread from a wagon into the store, and John Odiorne, an American prisoner, was with him, when suddenly he heard a great noise at the bottom of the square, and some persons were saying that the prisoners were pulling down the barrack wall, and the soldiers were running through the military way, as this informant supposed, to get their arms; and almost immediately after the alarm bell was rung, and the drums beat to arms, and the horns sounded; that, soon after, this informant saw a great body of prisoners between the railing and the market square, and some prisoners were in the market square; that just about this time, he (this informant) saw Dr. Magrath and Mr. McFarlane, the surgeons, go down the market square, and, just after, Captain Shortland also came into the market square, and the soldiers marched in with their officers; that this informant ordered the wagon away, not thinking it safe to let it remain, as the prisoners were at this time very riotous; and just as this informant had ordered the wagon away, the prisoners burst open the gate next the hospital and rushed in the market square, in a very large body, and at this time the outer gates were all open to permit the wagon to pass; and this informant believed, at the time, that the prisoners, taking advantage of the circumstance, were endeavoring to effect their escape; that the soldiers were formed across the square, and the prisoners had advanced in a body, in a riotous manner, calling out "keeno," close to the soldiers, within musket length, or thereabout, when the soldiers immediately charged upon the prisoners, but this informant did not hear any order to charge given, and this informant thinks that, from the noise made by the prisoners, it was impossible to hear any word of command; that the soldiers drove the prisoners at the point of their bayonets within the gates of the prison, whereupon the prisoners turned their faces towards the soldiers, still continuing assembled together in a large body, and began to throw stones at the soldiers, and, from the appearance of the size of the stones, he (this informant) has no doubt but that some of them were five or six pounds in weight; that the prisoners threw a great number of stones, and continued doing so for about two minutes, when this informant saw one of the muskets from the soldiers discharged towards the prison yard, and within a minute afterwards he saw the whole party fire their muskets, and it appeared to this informant that the muskets were elevated above the prisoners; that there was a large body of the prisoners assembled in the three yards in front of the gate, and stones were throwing in all directions towards the military, when this informant saw the soldiers fire their muskets towards the prisoners, and, about this time, he saw Dr. Magrath and Mr. McFarlane run up the market square, and soon after he saw a man brought up wounded; that this informant was standing on the steps of the store all the time before alluded to, and could distinctly see what was passing, except when the soldiers were involved in the smoke; that Odiorne and six or seven American prisoners were standing on the steps of the store, and they all saw the prisoners throwing stones at the soldiers; and this informant remarked to them, that, if the prisoners continued to assault the soldiers so, some of them would be shot; that this informant never heard Captain Shortland give any directions to the soldiers to fire, and he was so near to Odiorne that if orders had been given which he might have heard, he (this informant) must have heard also, as he has as quick an ear as most people; and this informant further saith, that the firing was very irregular, and it did not seem like firing in obedience to orders; and this informant further saith, that it appeared to him the soldiers were in danger from the stones thrown at them by the prisoners.

JOHN ARNOLD.

Sworn before me,

JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

William Gifford, a private soldier in His Majesty's first regiment of Somerset militia, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of this present month of April, about half-past six o'clock in the evening, he (this informant) was posted as sentinel in the market place, at the gate adjoining the hospital wall; that about half an hour after this informant had been posted, he heard the prisoners huzzaing in the yard of prison No. 7, and soon after the west guard, to which this informant belonged, was called for; that this informant then saw a prisoner come from No. 7 yard, with an iron bar in his hand, and a great number of prisoners were following him, and the prisoner who had the bar broke the lock of the gate, where this informant was sentinel, with it, and the prisoners rushed out as fast as they could come, crying out "keeno;" whereupon the alarm-bell was rung, and part of the north guard came into the market square, and Captain Shortland was with them; that the soldiers formed on the left side, where the crowd of prisoners was forcing up, there not being enough to form across the yard; that Captain Shortland spoke to the prisoners and ordered them back, but they did not go, and at this time they were so close to the military that they could be touched by the bayonet; that Captain Shortland ordered the soldiers to charge, which they did, and forced the prisoners almost to the prison gate, but they would not go into the prison yard, and stood fast at the gate; that the prisoners then began to throw stones at the soldiers, and this informant saw several of the men's caps knocked off with the stones; that the prisoners were very riotous, huzzaing and throwing a great number of stones or bricks at the soldiers, when this informant heard the word "fire" given by some person, but whom he does not know; that this informant immediately heard a discharge of musketry, and saw that the muskets were presented in the air; that the prisoners still continued huzzaing and throwing stones at the military, when the soldiers began to fire towards the prisoners, and this informant afterwards saw two men, like prisoners, lying in the market place apparently dead, one on the right side of the guard, and the other on the left; that the soldiers then went into the different prison yards to turn the prisoners in, and this informant heard some firing in the yards; that Major Jolliff had the command of the first Somerset regiment of militia, but he was not present when the first firing commenced; and this informant further saith, that the stones thrown at the soldiers were large enough to have killed some of them, and the stones were thrown so thick that it appeared to this informant the soldiers were in great danger; that this informant did not discharge his musket at all; that this informant was near to Captain Shortland when the prisoners were forced to the prison gate, and he never saw Captain Shortland with a musket in his hand, or attempt to take a musket; if he had, he (this informant) thinks that it was impossible for him not to have seen it; that he never heard Captain Shortland give any orders to fire, and this informant was so near to him that he thinks he must have heard him if he had given any such orders; that whilst the prisoners were huzzaing, many continued calling out "murder the rascal," by which this informant understood they meant Captain Shortland—and this was before any firing took place; and this informant further saith, that he did not hear or see a musket discharged on the evening of the 6th day of April instant before the prisoners began to throw stones.

Massacre at Dartmoor Prison.

James Groves, a private soldier in the first regiment of Somerset militia, on his oath, saith: That he was placed as sentinel in the barrack yard at Dartmoor prison, on the 6th day of April instant, and was relieved by Thomas Edwards at half-past six o'clock in the evening; that about five o'clock in the evening a ball was thrown over the wall close by the old cook room, which is now the armorer's shop, and the armorer was there at the door at the time, and he caught up the ball and threw it over the wall into the prison again; that this informant saw no other ball whilst he was on sentry, and no person whatever called to this informant to throw over any ball; that just at the time the armorer was about to throw the ball over, some person from the prison called out "throw the ball over," but after the ball was thrown over, this informant heard no further call; that whilst this informant remained on sentry, he did not hear any attack upon the wall, and saw no breach whatever therein.

Sworn before me,

JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

David Spencer Warren, a citizen of the United States of America, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday last, the 6th day of April instant, in the evening, about half an hour before the usual time of turning in the prisoners, he heard the alarm-bell, and went up to the gate of the yard of the prison No. 1, and when he arrived there he saw a number of prisoners in the market square, and a number of soldiers were in the square, and Captain Shortland was at the head of one party of them, and he was forming a line across the yard, which after he had done, he told them to charge; that the soldiers did charge on the prisoners, who ran back into the prison yard, and Captain Shortland and the soldiers followed them to the gate, and as the prisoners got inside the gate they flung one of them to; that Captain Shortland ordered one of the soldiers to fire, and immediately there was a soldier with his musket turned to the right, and Captain Shortland caught hold of the musket and pointed it towards a man that stood by the gate, and said "God damn you, fire;" that directly after this a fire of musketry became general; that this informant went through No. 1 prison and into No. 3, and was in prison No. 3 when the soldiers fired into the prison No. 3; and there was a man called Smith, a shipmate of this informant, wounded, and he also saw a man fall on the inside of the prison, but whether he was killed or wounded this informant cannot say; that this informant did not see any of the officers with the soldiers when Captain Shortland gave the order to fire; that after the firing began he saw some stones, he believes two or three, thrown by the prisoners over the wall into the square—he saw one of them about as big as his fist; that this informant did not observe whether the muskets were elevated at the first firing, but he did not see any man fall, and therefore he remarked to some of the prisoners that he thought they were blank cartridges; that this informant was not in the yard of No. 7.

DAVID S. WARREN.

Sworn before me,

JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

James Greenlaw, a citizen of the United States of America, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of April instant, he was in No. 3 yard, near the door of the prison, when he heard the alarm bell ring; that he went from thence towards the railing, at the entrance into the market square, and saw some prisoners in the market square, and at the same time he saw the troops coming through the market gate, with Captain Shortland at their head, and saw him form the men in one line extending across the square, and he then ordered them to charge; whereupon the prisoners retreated into the prison yard, when this informant heard Captain Shortland give orders for the soldiers to fire upon the prisoners; and thereupon this informant ran into No. 4 yard for shelter, and as this informant turned to go back again he saw two black men, whom he did not know, fall; that as soon as this informant thought the firing had ceased, he ran up towards the grating to speak to Captain Shortland, and asked if he would allow him to speak to him, when Captain Shortland said "No, you damned rascal!" whereupon two soldier officers put their swords through the iron railing towards this informant, and one soldier pricked him with his bayonet; that this informant then retreated into No. 3 yard, and he then heard two distinct volleys, and the soldiers shortly afterwards came into No. 3 yard, when he retreated into No. 3 prison, and sat down inside to assist in dressing a wounded man, and a moment after this he heard two distinct volleys fired into the prison, which killed one man and severely wounded another; that this informant did not see any stones thrown from the prison into the square until the firing had commenced, and then he saw two stones thrown over the wall from No. 4 prison; that this informant was not in No. 7 prison yard.

JAMES GREENLAW.

Sworn before me,

JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Thomas Burgess Mott, a citizen of the United States of America, on his oath, saith: That on the 6th day of April instant, this informant was in prison No. 5, when some persons came to him, as being one of the committee for the prisoners, and, in consequence of the information they gave, he procured some assistance, and was going out of the door of the prison to go towards a wall which he understood some men and boys were breaking, to prevent it; and just as he came to the door of the prison he heard a fire of musketry, as from the gateway of the market square, and met a crowd of prisoners retiring to their prisons, apparently in great confusion; when most of the people had passed, he met a man between No. 5 and No. 6 prisons, who was wounded and bleeding very much, and the man leaned on this informant, and he was proceeding towards the gateway to take him to the surgeon, but the fire of musketry and balls came so thick that he stepped forward a step or two to request permission to take the wounded man away, but he believes he was not heard; that he then turned to the back of No. 5 cook house, out of the way of the fire, where several others were standing, and they had not opened a fire from the ramparts of the lower wall which commanded the lower door of No. 5 prison; but as this informant and the others turned from the place to go into the prison, a fire of musketry was discharged towards the only door which was open of No. 5 prison, and shortly after this informant saw two men in the prison dead, but he does not know their names himself, or where they were killed, and he saw also several others wounded.

THOS. B. MOTT.

Sworn before me,

JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Enoch Burnham, a citizen of the United States on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of April instant, about half-past six o'clock in the evening, he went to the railing of the market place, and remained there about half an hour, when he saw a crowd of the prisoners making a noise, but the principal part of them were youngsters, full of mischief, and they came, some of them, between the two railings, and he saw seven or eight go into the market square, but there was no great body there; that at this time he saw some soldiers come down the square, and Captain Shortland with them, and the soldiers charged upon the prisoners, who retreated into No. 1 prison yard, without making any resistance; that this informant remained at the gate when the military began to fire, and at this time there was no crowd of prisoners within the gate—there might have been forty or fifty men; that when the firing commenced he retreated into the prison yard, and lay down by the wall, and the prisoners who were about the gate also retreated; that this informant lay by the wall about five or seven minutes, when this informant went up by the barrack wall, towards where there was a hole, and the soldiers then began to fire from the ramparts of the south wall, when he went to No. 7 prison, and got as far as the steps, when a heavy firing again commenced from the wall, and this informant lay down, to save his life, for about four or five minutes, and then got into the prison, and was going through to go to his own prison, and had got to the steps, when the firing commenced from the platform next to the south corner; whereupon he retreated into No. 7 again, and went into the north end, and saw one prisoner in the yard who appeared to be wounded, and he ran back against the wall, and he saw several soldiers raise their muskets and fire at him, and he fell immediately, but this informant does not know who the man was; that this informant saw the wounded man lift up his hands towards the soldiers before they fired; that this informant did not see any stones thrown, but he heard some of the youngsters speak about throwing stones; that he did not hear the word to fire given, and he was near the gratings; when the military first began to fire they were at some distance from the gratings.

ENOCH BURNHAM.

Sworn before me,

JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Robert Holmden, first clerk to Captain Shortland at the prison of war at Dartmoor, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of April instant, Richard Arnold, the turnkey, reported to this informant that the prisoners had got over the iron railing, near the south guard; whereupon he (this informant) went to an officer on the ramparts, and from him understood that a guard was going in to turn them out, and, on returning to the entrance gate, he met the guard going down; that there was also a rumor that a hole had been broken in the hospital wall; whereupon he went and reported it to Captain Shortland, who came out of the house, and went with this informant to the entrance gate, when they understood the hole was in the barrack wall, and Captain Shortland, with Sergeant Manning and some soldiers, went to the barrack yard, and found that a hole large enough for a person to creep through had been made; that Captain Shortland cautioned some prisoners who were looking through the aperture in the wall, and recommended them to retire, but they remained there; and a guard was left at the breach, and Captain Shortland and this informant returned to the entrance gate, and had not been there long when it was reported to Captain Shortland that the prisoners had forced one of the lower iron gates; whereupon Captain Shortland ordered the alarm-bell to be rung; and as soon as the guards could be collected, he went with them into the market square; and at this time he (this informant) saw a great number of prisoners coming up the north side of the yard in a riotous and disorderly state; that after a short time had elapsed, he (this informant) heard one shot fired, which was followed by several others; that he did not go down among the prisoners, or see what took place there.

ROBERT HOLMDEN.

Sworn before me,

JOS. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Homer Hull, a citizen of the United States of America, on his oath, saith: That he is in the prison No. 3; that on the 6th day of April instant, he (this informant) was walking in the lower part of the prison yard No. 7, about six o'clock in the evening, when, in consequence of a report he heard in the prison, he observed some drunken men breaking down the wall which separates the barrack yard from No. 7 yard; and one of the soldiers called from the wall at the corner of the barrack yard, and said, "Go in, men; they are going to charge upon you." That this informant went away towards the prison No. 3, and had to go out of No. 7 yard, near the market square, when he saw some drunken men, about half a dozen in number, at the gate leading into the market square, attempting to force it; one of them had a small iron bolt in his hand, and they succeeded in getting the gate open; that the man who forced the gate went a few yards into the square before any followed him, and then some others went in; that just at the time the gate was forced open, he saw some soldiers come into the market square at the upper gate, and Captain Shortland was with them; and at this time this informant thinks there were about sixty men in the square; that the soldiers marched about two-thirds of the way down, when Captain Shortland gave the soldiers orders to charge, and the soldiers accordingly charged, when the prisoners retreated into the prisons, and one of them shut to the gates; and the soldiers marched down a little further, when Captain Shortland ordered them to fire; that this informant went to his own prison, and tried to get in, but the crowd was so great that he could not succeed; that he tried at other prisons, but could not get in, and there succeeded;* that the alarm bell had not been rung when the soldier first ordered them to go into their prisons; that this informant heard the alarm-bell ring just after the man ordered them to go into their prisons; that he did not see any stones thrown before the musketry began to be discharged, but afterwards he saw a stone thrown from the prison yard towards the square.

HOMER HULL.

Sworn before me,

Jos. WHITEFORD, Coroner.

Robert McFarlane, assistant surgeon at the prison of war at Dartmoor, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of this present month of April, about seven o'clock in the evening, or rather afterwards, he was at the outer gate of the prison, when he heard the alarm-bell ring, and immediately went to the lodge, and seeing the guard drawn up in line in front of the guard house, he observed Captain Shortland walking by himself from the barrack yard towards the guard; that this informant turned round and looked down the market yard, and saw a multitude of prisoners proceeding up the square; whereupon he went down with Dr. Magrath, who came just at this moment, and began to reason with a number of prisoners there on the unnecessary steps they were taking; that some of them seemed to pay attention to what this informant said, and turned aside towards the prison, but others said they were not prisoners of war, and that they were determined to be out—one of whom had a stick behind his back, in his hand; that this informant saw Captain Shortland reasoning with a number of them to go back into the prisons, but they used very abusive language towards him, and this was in front of the guard; that this informant had taken two by the shoulders, and was insisting upon their going back; and, on looking back, the guard had charged, and this informant with great difficulty got himself extricated from between the bayonets; that by the time this informant got to the rear of the guard a single musket was fired, and immediately after several others; that this informant heard no order given to fire; that Captain Shortland was at the south end of the guard, and this informant thinks if he had given orders to fire he must have heard it; that at the time the first musket was fired, nearly one-third of the market square was filled with the prisoners, making a great noise in a very riotous and disorderly manner, and stones were throwing by the prisoners from all quarters, and one large stone fell about a yard from this informant; that immediately after the firing commenced, and this informant had got to the rear, he went away to the hospital; that from the number and size of the stones which were thrown, if he (this informant) had been obliged to remain on the spot where the soldiers were, he should have apprehended great danger to his person.

ROB. McFARLANE.

Sworn before me,

John Tozer, one of the turnkeys at the prison, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of April instant, about seven o'clock in the evening, the turnkeys were called into the market square, and he found that it was to take up some dead and wounded prisoners; that he went to the lower market gate, and just inside the gate he took up a black man dead, and assisted in carrying him to the bathing place in the hospital; that the man appeared to be about thirty; but this informant should not know him again.

JOHN TOZER.

Sworn before me,

Joseph Manning, sergeant in the first Somerset regiment of militia, on his oath, saith: That on Thursday, the 6th day of this present month of April, about seven o'clock in the evening, he was in the military way when he saw Captain Shortland, and reported to him that the prisoners had made a hole in the wall leading to the barracks, and he went with this informant, an officer, and some other persons, to see it; that this informant kept before Captain Shortland, and went away to the breach first, and saw the prisoners pulling the wall, and he desired them to desist, but they gave him abusive language, and he then took a musket and threatened to fire at them if they would not leave off, and they then drew back a little; that Lieutenant Avelyn then interfered, and put his head in the breach, telling them if they did not desist the consequences would be serious; Captain Shortland then inquired for Major Jolliff, and, by Captain Shortland's directions, this informant went to call Major Jolliff, and met him between the south guard and the barracks, when he ordered the troops to be formed, and put himself at the head of the grenadiers, and before Major Jolliff had gone ten yards from the south guard gate the firing commenced; that this informant, by Major Jolliff's orders, remained behind, to assist in forming the regiment; that it was impossible for Major Jolliff to give orders to fire, as he was not near the spot where the firing first began.

Examination at the Guildhall of Plymouth, on Friday, the 21st of April, 1815.

Present, John Hawker, Esq., one of the magistrates of the county of Devon.

John Rust, one of the committee of the American prisoners at Dartmoor, being sworn, says: The report made of the occurrence of the 6th instant, signed by me, was from the evidence of other persons. About six o'clock in the evening I came from the place where I was taking supper, and persuaded the prisoners to leave the breach; they did go away towards the square previous to the commencement of the firing. At the time I went to the breach the horn had not sounded; it sounded but a few minutes before the firing. I heard the alarm-bell ring before the firing took place; the firing continued at intervals about fifteen minutes. After the firing commenced, I went round the southeast part of prison No. 7, and went in at the southeast door. I saw nothing of the firing in the market square.

John T. Trowbridge, one of the committee, being sworn, says: I made no part of the report from my own knowledge, but I was one of them employed in taking depositions. I was walking about the southeast part of No. 7, near the breach in the wall, which, when I saw it, was about large enough for my body to pass through; about thirty persons were round it; did not know what it was made for; understood it was to get a ball. I remained in the prison yard, seeing the soldiers collect on the platforms. I saw nothing of what was passing in the square. I understood that the soldiers desired the prisoners to go in before the firing took place; the prisoners were not riotous. I heard the alarm-bell ring and the drum beat to arms before the firing; I heard no tumult in the market square before it began; I should have heard it, had there been any, from the place I was in. I do not believe there were many prisoners in the square; it was the alarm-bell which collected the prisoners, at least it made them go out of prisons Nos. 5 and 7. The firing lasted, in a straggling manner, from fifteen to twenty minutes; there were three or four volleys from the market square. I heard no order to fire after the firing from the square; there was firing from the platforms on the wall, from which it continued while the prisoners were endeavoring to get into their prisons; there was firing at No. 5 while they were entering.

James Boggs, one of the committee, being sworn, says: I made no part of the report from my own knowledge. I went into the northeast door of No. 3 before the firing. I understood that there was a man killed in that prison, but I did not state it from my own knowledge.

Amos Wheeler, sergeant of the north guard, being sworn, says: I was with the guard on the evening of the 6th; another sergeant was with me; assembled the guard by order, I believe, of Captain Shortland's clerk; had orders to march to the west guard house. On arriving, was ordered by the clerk to order arms; remained about ten minutes, and was then ordered by Captain Shortland to march to the market square; the officer of the guard was not then with it; our force was thirty-eight, besides two corporals; about five or six of another guard went into the square about the same time; the west guard was employed at the breach; there were not many prisoners in the market square when our guard entered. The alarm-bell had rung before we marched. When we entered, the prisoners were endeavoring to burst the gates below; cannot say whether the alarm-bell preceded the bursting of the gates; when they had succeeded in bursting them, there was a great rush towards the soldiers; their number kept increasing, until the space between the iron railings was quite full. They threw stones at the soldiers before there was any firing; they were not armed with anything that I saw; they appeared in the square nearly at the same time as my guard; they made the greatest push towards our left flank, where the guard was weakest; I was on the left flank; the prisoners were desired to go back, but they did not; they pressed on, and made a greater resistance against us. Then Captain Shortland ordered the soldiers to bring their muskets down to the charge, but, not advancing upon the prisoners, it appeared to have no effect upon them. I believe Captain Shortland was in front of the guard at this time, desiring the prisoners to go back. I saw none of the prisoners wresting the arms from the soldiers; I saw none of them attempt to seize the arms. The guard pressed to the left, to keep from being turned, by which I was thrown in the rear. Many more soldiers came from different parts before the firing commenced; I heard no order to fire, nor do I know how it began; did not hear any of the prisoners challenging the soldiers to fire; at this time there might be about two hundred prisoners in the square; they were much more numerous than the guard. I did not see the officer of the guard at this time. The firing was in an independent manner, three or four muskets being discharged at a time. After the firing commenced, the prisoners began to retire towards their prisons. I did not hear any cheering among them, or see them rally after the fire; think I must have heard it, had there been any cheering. I do not think that the prisoners could have been made to retire without firing; the soldiers might, by killing them with the bayonet, have dispersed them. I did not go into the prison yard. I did not hear of any firing of my guard after the prisoners had retreated.

John Saunders, private in the first regiment of Somerset militia, one of the north guard, being sworn, says: I was with the first party of soldiers that marched into the market square; at that time the gate was broken open; the prisoners were coming through in a crowd as fast as they possibly could; the alarm-bell rung at the time we reached the west guard house; the officer of the guard was with us, I believe; I believe it was he who ordered us into the square. The west guard was marched in nearly about the same time; fifteen file were told off on the left, whom Captain Shortland, after some time of discourse with the prisoners to make them retire, ordered to charge; with some difficulty we got the prisoners back to the gates; some of them were retiring through the gates. I do not know that any injury was done to them until after they were inside the gates; had, till this, heard no firing. The square was nearly clear of prisoners before the firing; they did not return into the square, but threw some stones through the rails. I heard the word "fire" given, but do not know by whom. There were no prisoners in the market square when the first shots were fired. The prisoners had the command of the gates, so as to open them when they thought proper. I fired my musket. The prisoners closed the gates after them, which we opened, and we received orders from the commanding officer to charge the men to their prisons. No muskets were fired in compelling them to their prisons. Just before the firing, the prisoners were throwing stones, and insulting the soldiers, calling out to them to fire. Saw no prisoners attempting to wrest the arms from the soldiers. Several shots were fired into prison No. 3; they were fired into the doorway; they were fired by two or three soldiers. I heard no order given for this fire, and had heard none to cease firing; there was much disturbance among the prisoners going in, and a stone was thrown out, which I saw myself. The turnkey was then near the soldiers, close to the door, and was endeavoring to shut it; the prisoners were willing to go in, and the turnkey could not close it; they stood at the door, challenging the soldiers, and offering to fight them if they would lay down their pieces; this was before the firing into the door; it was locked up immediately after the fire; do not think I could say rightly who the soldiers were that fired into the prison.

William Smith, private of the first Somerset militia, being sworn, says: I was on the north guard on the evening of the 6th of April. I marched into the market square with the guard. As we were going into the square, the prisoners were coming through the gates in a violent manner; the alarm-bell rang before we entered the square, while we were at the west guard house. I was one of the fifteen file ordered to charge; the prisoners fell back when we came down to the charge, but, after a little while, advanced again. The prisoners fell back to the gates, and had partly gone through before the firing began; I heard no order to fire; do not know the soldier who fired the first musket; was not near him; the prisoners had not come back upon our left when the firing began, and after the charge, but they were throwing stones, (one of which fell about a yard from me,) and were abusing the soldiers, daring them to come on. The firing was in an independent manner, one after another, till nearly all the guard had fired, and then they loaded again; no order was given to fire; do not know of any soldier having fired into any of the prisons; do not know how long the firing lasted. After the prisoners had returned into their yards, we went into them, to see if there were any stragglers about. When I went into the yard, did not hear any firing from sentinels on the walls.

John Tutt, private, being sworn, says: I was on the north guard the night of the disturbance; the alarm-bell rang when I was at the west guard house, before I entered the market square; about forty or fifty prisoners had burst into the square, through the gate next the hospital, when we marched in. I was one of the fifteen file ordered to charge; cannot say exactly who ordered us to charge, but think it was Captain Shortland's voice. The prisoners were so close to me that I had not room to come down to the charge, and drove them back to get room. We advanced upon them at the charge. While charging, a stone, of seven or eight pounds weight, knocked off my cap, I stooped to pick it up; was not knocked down, but somewhat stunned, and the plate of my cap was bruised; the firing began directly; the prisoners resisted greatly while we were charging; they resisted up to the time we fired. I think there were about one hundred prisoners in the square when the firing began; after they were driven back, there was much firing into the prisons; saw one soldier firing into prison No. 1; the prisoners were throwing out stones at the time; they were all nearly in when the firing into No. 1 took place, but some were still pushing in at the doorway; the turnkey was endeavoring to get near the door, but was not in front, in consequence of the stones thrown out; I heard no order for the firing in the square; it commenced while I was picking up my cap; saw no more than one shot fired into No. 1.

William Rowles, private, one of the north guard, being sworn, says: I was one of the fifteen file told off in order to charge. Captain Shortland gave the order to charge. I could come down to the charge, and did so; and those near me advanced at the charge upon the prisoners, who would not retire at first, even when the point of the bayonet touched their clothes. We advanced on them about eight or ten yards down towards the gate. A great many of them retired through the gate before there was any firing; they aggravated the soldiers by insulting and abusive language, and dared them to fire. I heard an order to fire, but do not know from whom. When the firing began, the prisoners were rushing again through the gate, into the square, and throwing stones over the platform. I suppose there were twenty times more prisoners in the market square than soldiers before the firing. I entered the prison yard, saw a soldier level his musket into prison No. 3, who was then about five or six yards from the door; many prisoners stood at the door in a resolute manner, and would not let the turnkey shut it; the doorway was as full it could as hold; they threw out great stones, as big as my head. I heard no order to the soldier to fire into No. 3; saw no officer there at this time. I was telling the prisoners to go into the prison, when one of them endeavored to wrest the bayonet from my musket, but I drew it back in time to save it; this was before the firing into the doorway. I believe that there was no more than one shot fired into No. 3; after it was fired, the prisoners went back, and allowed the turnkey to shut the door.

John Hamlet, private, one of the north guard, being sworn, says: I was the right hand man of fifteen file told off to charge; I heard the order given to charge by Captain Shortland; I immediately came down to the charge, having room enough; we advanced a short distance; we could not advance far, owing to the prisoners being so near; they did not retire very fast; cannot exactly say how many prisoners there were in the square when we began to charge, but suppose there might be a hundred; we used all possible means to make them retire, but some were so obstinate that they advanced even to the points of the bayonets; others, however, retreated; they were very abusive, and throwing stones; many dared us to fire. I was struck with a stone in advancing, on my right knee, which nearly knocked me down, and I very narrowly escaped another blow on my head. I received the blow after the firing commenced; our charge with the bayonet made some few of them retire through the gates; the greater part, indeed, retired through the gates, and remained on the other side throwing stones. Before the firing, and after the charge, some returned back through the gates, and advanced; some advanced even after the first fire; they shouted and cheered while advancing, which was intended to animate others to persevere like themselves; numbers of the first muskets fired were elevated in the air, some were elevated to the centre, I did not see any one fall on the first fire; the firing was not in volleys. I followed into the prison yards; did not see any firing into the prisons; after the firing had been kept up for some considerable time, the prisoners retreated. I heard an order to fire given before any firing took place, but do not know by whom. I do not think the prisoners could have been driven back without firing, unless great slaughter had been made of them by the bayonet. I cannot positively assert whether there was any firing on our right besides that by ourselves.

John Williams, sergeant, being sworn, says: I was on the south guard the night of the disturbance; our guard entered the market square after the north guard, and formed to its right; our number was about forty; it consisted of fifty-one, but had several sentries out. The firing had not commenced when we formed upon the north guard; it began about ten minutes or a quarter of an hour after we had formed; we were formed just about the time the north guard charged; when we formed, there were about one hundred prisoners in the square. I think they were more numerous than the soldiers; the line of soldiers almost occupied the breadth of the square, but there were not enough to form it completely across; there was an opening between our guard and the north; the prisoners did not fall back for some considerable time after the charge; they were throwing stones through and over the rails, and abusing the soldiers, when the firing began; I heard no order to fire; our officers never ordered us to fire; our guard, seeing the state the prisoners were in, and the north guard fire, began firing of their own accord, but not in volleys, and then the reports made prevented us hearing what was going on; the north guard fired first; at the first fire the prisoners ran back through the gateway, but afterwards many returned again to the gate, but did not advance through on us; heard cheering, and did not know whether they would not come out on us. I did not go into the prison yard, nor did any of our guard; our officer kept us in line till the prisoners were all locked up. I do not suppose the prisoners would have gone back without firing, because they did not appear to retire even when the bayonets were quite close to them. I heard the firing for some minutes after the prisoners had retired through the gate.

John Twyford Jolliff, major commanding, being sworn, handed in a statement, of which the following is a copy:

APRIL 7, 1815.

Yesterday evening, between the hours of six and seven o'clock, soon after the officers' dinner, the mess waiter came into the mess room, and said that the American prisoners had broken out of the prison, and were attempting their escape. I immediately ordered the troops composing the garrison to fall in at the alarm-post. Whilst the troops were forming I heard several shots fired, upon which I immediately took the grenadiers, and proceeded to the west guard, supposing that the prisoners were actually coming down the military way (as it is called) in great bodies. Upon my arrival at the west guard, several of the troops were formed in the market place, and had fired some shots. I immediately called out to them to cease firing; and finding that the prisoners still refused to go into their prisons, I took a party of grenadiers, and went into two of the prison yards, and told the prisoners to go into their prisons, which they very reluctantly did. Several stones were thrown at the military, and two at myself, one of which came very near me. The military fired a few shots at the prisoners in the yard, in consequence of their throwing stones and refusing to go into the prison, but the firing was without my orders, and I conceive took place owing to the military being so exasperated. As soon as the prisoners were all gone into their different prisons, and properly secured, I returned to the barracks, having ordered the guards to be reinforced, and the troops to be ready to fall in at a moment's notice. It appears that they had selected the hour of the officers' dinner to begin their operations, supposing we should not be ready.

Major 1st Somerset militia.

Massacre at Dartmoor Prison.

Understanding that evidence has been produced to prove that a bugle sounded the signal to fire, I beg leave to observe, that I was first apprized of this circumstance after my return from Dartmoor. I never gave, as commanding officer, any order, directly or indirectly, to that effect, nor did I hear previously any report that such a circumstance had taken place.

J. T. JOLLIFF,

Major 1st Somerset militia.

He further says: There was no general order that when the soldiers on sentry heard one of them fire, they should consider it an order to fire also; but I suppose they might so consider it. One man fired into one of the prisons, which arose, as I believe, from exasperation, on being struck by a stone thrown by of the prisoners. I did not see any one put his musket into the door to fire. Several shots were fired in the prison yards, but entirely without any command.

George Pitt, sergeant, being sworn, says: I was with Major Jolliff among the grenadiers in the prison yard, and he used all the means in his power to prevent the firing: I heard him crying out to the men to cease firing.

Henry Burgoyne, private, being sworn, says: I was on the platform at the bottom of the market square. A prisoner came with an iron bar, who, upon hearing a shout from the prisoners at the breach, when a piece fell out of the wall, which I heard, broke the gate open immediately, by striking off the lock, and the prisoners rushed through; and when we left the platform they pressed very much upon us; they were as thick as they could be; the alarm bell was ringing about this time; the yard where the break was, was as full of prisoners as it could be. I belonged to the west guard. I did not see any prisoners wrestling the arms from the guard. I could not see the breach on account of a projection of the wall, but heard the bar at work; they were quite thick down to the prison, waiting, I suppose, till the breach was made; the horn had sounded as usual for them to go in, but, instead of going in as they usually did very quietly, they came out; they pressed on us so much that we were forced to fall back; after we came to the charge they would not retire, and, being unwilling to stab, we were forced to give back. I heard an order to fire, but do not know who gave it. I did not observe how the first muskets were levelled.

Edward Jackson, private of the Derby militia, being sworn, says: I was on the platform 18 and 19, between prisons Nos. 5 and 6. I think there had been two volleys in the market square before the men on this platform fired; myself and another sentry were posted on the platform; we had not fired before some soldiers came up on the platform; I never fired; it was the men who came up; I cannot say whether the sentry fired; they fired into the yard up towards the gate; there were a great many prisoners at the upper part of the yard; I did not see any firing into the prisons. There was one or two officers on the platform; no order was given to fire on my platform; to the best of my recollection, I think I heard a command "to commence firing from the right." The prisoners were all in a great body, near the gates at the top of the yard, when the firing commenced, and, after the firing, they retreated to their prisons. When I was placed sentinel, several prisoners were inside the palisades clodding one another; some soldiers charged them out of it; there were two rounds of firing from my platform; there were about twenty soldiers on it, but cannot say exactly; it was full of them; I could not see the breach; I saw no tumult in the yard before the firing in the square, except the clodding; I cannot say I heard the alarm bell ring.

Adjourned till to-morrow.

Examination at Dartmoor prison of war, on Saturday, the 22d April, 1815.

Present, Paul Treby Treby, Esq., one of the magistrates for the county of Devon.

Thomas Burgess Mott, one of the committee of American prisoners, sworn: (A letter had been handed in by Captain Shortland, signed in this witness's hand, and addressed to Captain Shortland, requesting his release, and stating that "although he had been called on by the respectable part of the prisoners to inquire into the cause of the late unfortunate affair, neither his depositions nor conduct appeared to show that he would wish to lay the blame to Captain Shortland, but on the contrary, for which he had since been insulted by those men that were and had been the occasion of the late unfortunate affair.") There never has been, to my knowledge, any concerted plan among the American prisoners at this prison to break out. I have never been insulted by any of the men supposed to be ringleaders in the late affair, but, on the contrary, the prisoners think I was doing everything in my power for their benefit. The letter handed in by Captain Shortland was written for me by another prisoner, to get me clear in any way; it was not signed by me; I told him I would give him a pound if he got me released; it was written without design to injure anybody, and merely to get me clear, as my turn of release was not near; I never read the letter; I was one of the committee who made the report to Mr. Beasley; some part of it was from my own knowledge, and some part of it from the testimony of others. I saw a crowd where the hole was, but did not think it was occasioned by anything but gambling, till I was called upon by the prisoners to go and make them desist from the hole. When I was in the yard of Nos. 5 and 7, and when the firing into it from the platform took place, there was no tumult; there were then but few persons in it; I was not in the market square; I think the making of the hole was merely through mischief, but not at all to get out, for I do not think twenty would have wanted to go out if the gates had been open; I do not know particularly of any subject of complaint shortly before the affair; I do not know of any one who complained before Admiral Rowley of the American Government; I was present the whole time; I do not know of any particular uneasiness among the prisoners at present, or any cause of complaint of their treatment; they are a little impatient to be sent home; there has been frequent little vexatious interruptions to the market, &c., on slight grounds; I did not see any one shot, though some fell close by me; I did not hear the horn sound before the firing.

Walter Colton, one of the committee, being sworn, says: None of the report was made from my own knowledge, but entirely from examinations. I am confident there was no disposition on the part of the prisoners to break out; had there been, I should certainly have known it, because I was in the constant habit of going through the prisons, having much business with the prisoners as one of their committee. It is impossible but it must have been known had there been any. Had the gates been thrown open, not more than a hundred would have gone out: those who chose could have got away on the 4th. The first I heard of the disturbance was the firing; I was then in No. 3; did not hear the horn; it is not generally heard inside; there was great irritation against Captain Shortland before the disturbance; this was owing to acts of barbarity on his part. I speak from my own knowledge. Instead of doing things to make them comfortable, he did quite the contrary. He has kept two prisons, the best and most comfortable, shut, when it was in his power to have opened them; the prisoners remonstrated against this, but it produced no effect, while they were turned into prisons open at top, and floating with water two or three inches deep; this was No. 2. There was a plan formed in No. 6, one of the best and most commodious prisons, two several times, to dig out, which was both times discovered by Captain Shortland, and on the second occasion the prisoners were turned into No. 2; they were, however, only kept there two nights, and then returned to No. 6; I call this an act of barbarity. Captain Shortland never returned any answer to our application to go into the empty prisons; I know of no statement of complaint against the American Government, previous to the late affair; there have been often complaints of neglect against Mr. Beasley, but not against the American Government. Another act of Captain Shortland was: about the time of the attempt to dig out, there were some bars broken in one of the prisons, in consequence of which, and the digging out, I suppose, one-third of our provisions was stopped for ten days. I know not what it was for, unless for this and the digging out. Captain Shortland frequently stopped our provisions in the same way, without giving any reason. There has been no particular uneasiness among the prisoners to get out, since the account of the ratification of the treaty, and I know of no acts of violence among them in consequence; they were only anxious to be sent home, and expressed their opinions about it.

William Hobart, one of the committee, being sworn, says: Some part of the report was made from my own knowledge, but not much; I was in the lower part of the yard Nos. 1 and 3 when the alarm-bell rang; I had not heard the horn sound to go in when the alarm-bell rang; I expect I should have heard it; it can generally be heard all over the yard; when I heard the bell I walked up to the railing next the market square to see what occasioned the alarm; when I got within a few yards of the railing, saw the soldiers coming into the market square. I think there must have been four or five hundred soldiers in the square before the firing began; there were many there, and others marching in and forming; I heard no orders to fire; the prisoners were coming up, as I was, to see what was the matter; I returned immediately to my own prison. There were two volleys fired into a prison, into No. 3; most of the prisoners were retreating after the first volley; I had been in about five minutes before the firing; was on the second floor; did not see the soldiers who fired, but heard the report; and when I came down, saw marks of balls within; there were no stones thrown from the second floor; should have known it, as I was walking with some others. There were several lines of soldiers drawn across the square; a few prisoners were at the bottom of it then, but they were not so numerous as the soldiers; I am fully confident there was no intention to break out. I heard no shouting or threats against Captain Shortland when the firing commenced. The prisoners did not cheer in the yard I was in, nor in the market square, while I was present. Captain Shortland has behaved in a very tyrannical manner towards the prisoners; he stopped the market for ten days for a very trivial occurrence, and part of the provisions for the same length of time; do not think there was any intention among the prisoners to revenge themselves on Captain Shortland; there has been some irritation against Mr. Beasley latterly, because they thought he was somewhat dilatory in preparing carts, but there were none whatever against the American Government; there was a report that vessels of war would come from America to take prisoners, but even when first started it did not gain much credit; the upper stories of Nos. 2 and 4 have been unfit for the men to live in, very open, and sometimes afloat with rain.

William B. Orne, one of the committee, being sworn, says: I saw a little of the affair stated in the report, but the principal part was from the examination of others. I was walking between No. 7 and the barrack wall; did not observe that many prisoners were there; they are always so numerous in the yard, that one might not observe whether there was a crowd or not; I heard no bar breaking the wall; went into my own yard, Nos. 1 and 3; the prisoners were almost all in. I heard the alarm-bell, upon which I walked up to the railings, and saw the soldiers firing on the prisoners; could not tell the number of the soldiers, but the yard appeared to be full; it appeared to me, from the number of muskets I heard, that the whole regiment must have fired several volleys. I went behind the cook house, and heard the balls flying in all directions; the prisoners ran up to the railings from curiosity; was not near enough to hear an order to fire; after firing a few volleys, they opened the gates, and charged the prisoners in the yard, and, after they were in their prisons, they fired in; I heard that shots were fired into No. 3—into the door; saw no stones thrown out of No. 3; saw only one stone thrown into the square; the firing appeared to me to last fifteen or twenty minutes. I heard a noise among the prisoners, but no particular shouting or cheering; saw the greater part of the prisoners run; after the first fire, every man secured himself as well as he could; there appeared no interval in the firing; it continued all the while, until the soldiers opened the gates and went into the yard. I knew of no intention whatever among the prisoners to break out; we were then daily expecting cartels.

Niel McKinnon, prisoner, being sworn, says: I was in the yard No. 7 before the alarm-bell rang. I saw some men making a breach in the wall. At first, there were only three or four, but afterwards they increased to about twenty or twenty-five, standing round. I can ascribe this conduct to nothing but mere wantonness; can ascribe it to no other motive. I staid till the hole was made, and they began to throw things at the sentry. I saw the sentry put his bayonet through as a warning; he desired them several times to go away. I belong to another prison. I came to the gate. I heard the alarm-bell ring before I came. I saw a turnkey looking in the direction of the breach, and, expecting that the military would be called out, I went to gate No. 4. I remained there a considerable time, until the troops were drawn up in line; they then charged. I could see into the market square. I saw the prisoners between the railings, and the soldiers in front of No. 4 gate. My attention was engrossed by what was before me, and I did not observe how many there were to my right at No. 1 gate. I heard an order given to charge and fire, but do not know by whom. At this time the prisoners were daring the military, but not expecting they really would hurt them. Cannot say I saw any stones thrown. I saw the first fire, but did not observe the elevation of the muskets. The prisoners retreated after the first fire, but I heard them shouting and rallying—cheering each other—and I think I heard them again dare the soldiers to fire. I heard several say they thought they were blank cartridges; I gave it as my opinion. I went down towards my prison, and was told on the way that Haywood was killed. I went to see, and saw a black man lying within the inner gate of No. 4. I then went up to the gate to speak to Captain Shortland. The turnkey let me through, and I told Captain Shortland that a man was killed, and begged him to make the firing cease, and not to be wasting the lives of the prisoners. He told me to go to my prison. I spoke to the officer apparently commanding the guard to the same purport, who said there should be a truce if the prisoners would go to their prisons. Captain Shortland knew me personally. I was going to No. 1 gate, and saw several persons at the door of the receiving house, with two or three wounded men. One of these persons was drunk, and abused the soldiers, who did not appear to attend to him so much as they might, had he been sober. I went down to No. 4 yard. While going down the yard, a volley was fired into it by the soldiers in the market square. There were many prisoners then in the yard. I did not see more than one line of military in the square; it was two deep, and extended almost across. Was going up the yard, when I met a party of military with an officer, driving along four or five prisoners. I went up to the officer, (who I understood afterwards was Major Jolliffe,) and remonstrated with him on the harsh treatment the prisoners were receiving. He put his fist in my face, and swore "by God, they would not trifled with any longer by us," (the prisoners.) I was then driven with the rest into No. 4, the sergeant having his halbert close to one of the prisoners, and the soldiers their bayonets charged. I entered the prison with my face to the soldiers, until I was so far that I thought I was safe, when I turned my back, and at that moment a musket was fired close to me, which wounded a little boy, who screamed and dropped down: he died the next day. There were no stones thrown out when the shot was fired, nor any insulting language used towards the soldiers. The prisoners were crowding round the door, not being able to get in fast enough, but there was no tumult among them. Heard no order to fire the shot. I heard the report near me. The doors were then locked up. I have not the least belief that there was any concert or intention among the prisoners to break out. I did not know the arms were kept in the barrack yard, nor do I believe it was generally known among the prisoners. I think the breach and the breaking of the gate were only acts of wantonness, like throwing turf at each other. There was a good understanding between the prisoners and the soldiers, particularly the Derby militia; they used to be of assistance to them when the markets were stopped. The Somerset regiment was not up to so much as the Derby. I think the sentries were removed from the yard to prevent communication with the prisoners, not through any fear of them. If there had been any concert, they would have made some preparations; but there did not appear any among them, as the gambling tables were not removed from where they usually were. I have since seen some who broke the wall, who have expressed sorrow for what they had done, from the consequences resulting from it, but declared they had no intention to escape.

Francis Joseph and Henry Allen, the two remaining of the committee, knew nothing of their own knowledge, and were, therefore, not examined.

John G. Gatchell, prisoner, being sworn, says: I belong to No. 7 prison. On the 6th of April, between six and seven in the afternoon, while walking in that yard, I heard a report that some boys were making a hole in the wall. Being in the yard abreast of the market square, I saw Captain Shortland coming down the market square at the head of a party of soldiers; they were formed in a line, and began to fire immediately. I did not see any prisoners then in the square; a few were between me and the railings. I could have seen any who might have been in the square. I saw no charge of the bayonet. I heard an order to fire, but do not know by whom; at the first volley one man fell about four yards from me. I went to him, and asked what was the matter; he said he was wounded in the breast, but I did not believe it, thinking it impossible, till I felt it. I called assistance, and was trying to get him to the receiving house, when Captain Shortland entered No. 7 gate with two soldiers, and said something which induced the two others to run away and leave the wounded man with me; upon which, Captain Shortland, seeing I did not run, said, "Kill the damned rascal;" the soldiers charged on me, and a bayonet pierced my clothes and skin, going in about a quarter of an inch. I was then forced to leave the wounded man and run, when a soldier followed me; and Captain Shortland, urging him on, repeated several times "Kill the damned rascal." While running on I was pricked three times, and should have been killed, but, stepping aside, the bayonet ran under my arm; and the soldier, with the force of the thrust, fell on his knees, by which means I escaped into the prison. There are four doors to No. 7 prison; all but one were shut, which one was exposed to the fire; all the prisoners were crowding to one door; the door left open was the one which was usually so; but the doors were shut, I think, sooner than usual, and the prisoners were trying to get in at the shut doors; the prisoners being pursued by the soldiers, all crowded to one door, one over the other, and, being unable to get in fast enough, were wounded by the bayonets of the soldiers pressing behind. While getting in No. 7, I saw Captain Shortland running down the yard towards No. 5 with the soldiers, and heard him order them to fire; am quite sure I heard him order them to fire; he was facing me at the time; was running towards No. 5, and ordering them to fire as they ran, which they did; cannot positively say he had arms in his hands when coming down the yard. I did not see that the soldiers hesitated to fire when ordered; they did fire. Never had any personal altercation or difficulty with Captain Shortland; never spoke to him, nor been spoken to by him. Do not think there was any intention to break out. The firing in the yard was after that in the market square; two soldiers came in the gate abreast of Captain Shortland, but many followed him—thirty or forty, perhaps. After the soldiers were in the yard, those on the ramparts did not fire. There were about forty or fifty shots by those in the yard. While the prisoners were running to No. 7, they were cut off by a cross-fire from the ramparts; (he pointed to the place where he was wounded in the back,) was told by others my wound was a quarter of an inch deep; it swelled up considerably, and was very sore, as was the case with all three wounds; was never under any of the surgeons or surgeons' mates.

Andrew Davis, prisoner, being sworn, says: I belong to No. 3 prison. I was at the bottom of No. 3 yard on the evening of the 6th, just before, counting in time, the horn had sounded. On the first report of muskets, the prisoners said they were blank cartridges. I went up to No. 1 gate. When I got there, five or six men were bringing a man who appeared to be badly wounded into the market square; they had brought him inside the inner gate next the square. I heard Captain Shortland order them to let go the wounded man. One of them remonstrated against it, and Captain Shortland struck him with his fist. The man then went outside of the gate into the passage between the two gates, and said to Captain Shortland, "You'll recollect you have struck me twice, and I'll have satisfaction for it." Captain Shortland told him to go into the prison, or he would order the men to fire on him. I then went down to No. 1 prison, and saw no more. The soldiers were drawn up in the square when the wounded man was there, and Captain Shortland in front of them. It was about ten minutes or a quarter of an hour after the firing began that the above transaction took place. One or two volleys were fired after that.

John Odiorne, prisoner being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner being read to him, said he had no correction to make in it, other than it was possible that there might have been some few prisoners in the square, but there were no numbers of them, previously to the drawing up of the soldiers in the square.) I stood on the steps at the cook-house in the market square. I could see the whole of what was passing in the square. The gate was burst about the same moment the soldiers were firing obliquely to the left, after they were drawn up in line. The prisoners rushed in immediately, but not violently. I heard an order to fire, which was from Captain Shortland, as near as I can judge of any man who had his back to me: it was in Captain Shortland's voice. He was about one hundred feet from me. I am as positive as I can be under such circumstances that the order came from him. Captain Shortland appeared to be in a great passion when entering the square: he looked very red, and spoke loud. I am confident there was no disposition to break out. There was very little interval of time between the marching of the soldiers into the square and the sounding of the horn for turning in; the horn was first; the alarm-bill rang nearly at the same time that the soldiers entered the square. The prisoners generally conceived that there was a tardiness in Mr. Beasley's fitting out ships, and there was discontent among them against him, but no complaint against the American or British Governments.

Gerard Smith, prisoner, being sworn, says: I was in the market square with Captain Odiorne, who requested me to stay, after the horn was sounded, till the wagon was unloaded. I told him my prison would be shut, as the horn had sounded, and I would be shut out, and I thought I had better go. I did stay several minutes longer. Seeing the prisoners nearly all in, I said I must go. I saw Arnold coming up the square, and saw also Captain Shortland by himself close to the wagon. The captain asked Arnold whether the prisoners were all in. Arnold said, "Sir, they have got two holes in the wall." Captain said, "Damn you, why did you not let me know that before?—go and ring the bell." I turned from Odiorne, bade him good night, and went down to the gates, which were all closed, and I was obliged to get over the railing. When I got over, I saw no tumult among the prisoners. One man told me that some boys had taken some stones out of the wall, and wondered what it could be for. "I do not know," said I, "but I suppose it is through mischief."

Robert Johnson, prisoner, being sworn, says: I know Gatchell; I was at the gate No. 7 when Capt. Shortland spoke to him; I ran directly up to the gate from No. 5; at the first firing a wounded man lay about five or six yards from the gate, on the prison side; Gatchell and two or three others came up to take him, as I suppose, to the receiving house; when he got into the passage between the railings, Captain Shortland came in with two or three soldiers, and told them to go back, or he would kill them; the soldiers followed; in rushing in, Captain Shortland stumbled over the wounded man; Gatchell did not go away immediately; Captain Shortland ordered the soldiers to charge on him; one did charge on him, and another on me; I then made my escape into the prison; I am quite sure Captain Shortland ordered the soldiers to charge; this was after the firing in the market square. At the first fire I was in my berth; had no idea that there would be any disturbance, or that the military were firing with ball. I heard no abusive language from Captain Shortland.

James N. Bushfield, prisoner, being sworn, says: I was present all the time the breach was being made, but was not one of those who did make it; I had no idea it was for the purpose of making their escape, but supposed it was through mere mischief; there were about twenty or twenty-five prisoners round it; they began in the morning; I was there when the sentinel told them to go away, or he would fire; they set up a laugh, and drew back after he put his bayonet through the hole, forming a circle of fifteen or twenty-five feet from the wall; at that time there were not more than twenty-five or thirty people, but afterwards they ran from all quarters to see the hole, hearing the others at it laughing; they knew nothing of it before; I went towards the gate when I heard the first fire, which I supposed was with blank cartridges, until I heard the balls whistle; do not suppose a man in the yard knew there were arms in the barrack yard.

Adjourned until to-morrow, 8 o'clock.

DARTMOOR, Sunday, April 23, 1815.

Met, pursuant to adjournment, at 8 o'clock.

Present: Paul Treby Treby, Esq., one of the magistrates for the county of Devon.

William Clements, prisoner, being sworn, says:

I was most of the evening at prison No. 1, and towards the close of the evening was going to my own prison, No. 7; I saw about twenty or thirty prisoners gathered round the wall of No. 7, and considered they were gambling; going up to it, saw dirt about a breach in the wall, and then several took up stones and threw them at it, in order to force it through. I went down the yard, and came up again, at which time they were still throwing against the breach; they made a hole; I then saw Captain Shortland come up to it with some soldiers on the other side; he spoke through the hole, asking what they did it for; a number answered they had nothing to do with it, and some said they dug it for amusement; Captain Shortland said, if they did not disperse, he would be obliged to fire upon them; he then went away; they then dispersed and some who were digging went into their prisons; I heard no insulting language to Captain Shortland; the hole was then large enough for a man to get through; saw none attempt to get through; I considered the digging of the hole was merely through mischief; a number of small places had been dug in the wall in the course of the day; a great many prisoners were in the yard No. 7—more, perhaps, than usual, it being so fine an evening; I went towards my own prison, and found all the doors but one shut; I heard a great noise at the top of the yard, and went towards the gates; heard many cry out "keeno;" keeno is said among the prisoners when anything falls, even in the prison; many cry it out when they do not know what is the matter; I suppose there were about forty or fifty soldiers then in the market square, drawn up on one side; the prisoners were going through at No. 1 gate; the soldiers came down to the charge, and then drew back; the prisoners were not so numerous as the soldiers; I suppose there might be thirty prisoners in the square; they made no opposition; some of them appeared to be in liquor; the prisoners are not permitted to be in the market square; the gates were locked; when the prisoners were driven through the gate, the soldiers fired; they fired into No. 1 gate. I heard no order to fire; was not in a situation to hear it; the soldiers fired right into the gates; did not observe how the muskets were levelled the first fire; I considered they fired with blank cartridges first; this was into No. 1 gate, and there were only a few shots, but afterwards a volley; I saw a man fall at No. 1 gate, when I, with others, attempted to remove him, when another volley was fired in; put him behind the wall; he said he was wounded in the breast; we put our hands there, but felt nothing; he soon died, and then we found the ball had entered his head. At the time of the first fire I heard no abuse from the prisoners, nor saw any stones thrown during the whole time; there was some turf inside the square, which I thought had been brought in by the people who had the liberty of the square; after the first fire the prisoners did not rally or cheer, but were eager to get into their prisons; I cannot say why so many of the prisoners were out at the time; I did not hear the alarm bell; a number of prisoners knew nothing of it till they heard the reports of the muskets; saw an officer with the soldiers; the officer was the first man who entered No. 7 yard; it was not Captain Shortland; I saw Captain Shortland in the yard, but whether it was he or the other officer who first came in I do not know; I saw an officer having hold of a prisoner by the collar, and strike him with a sword once or twice; he made no attempt to stab him; I then went into No. 7, and saw nothing more. There was no particular uneasiness among the prisoners, at not being released, only talking about it, and saying they thought it hard; but they were as obedient to the orders and regulations of the prison as before the account of the ratification.

John Hubbard, prisoner, being sworn, says: I was carrying a wounded man to the hospital; Captain Shortland came up to me, (I was then about half way up the market square;) he ordered me to drop the man; I told him I should not, for he was a dead man, and I wanted to take him to the hospital; he gave me a crack on the neck with his fist, and ordered the soldiers to charge on us; I then went back directly, as the soldiers were running towards me, and ran in; they did not follow us any distance; they halted as soon as we ran; when I got in I called to Captain Shortland, and told him, "You will recollect, sir, you struck me, if you are brought to account for this," he said, "he would strike my damned heart if he had me there;" I am sure of this; I did not threaten him that I would have satisfaction of him. I do not know any of the men who were with me, helping to take the dead man; there were about four or five; the soldiers at this time were drawn up across the square; there had been much firing before this; I saw the soldiers fire into No. 3, after the prisoners were in; I was standing close to the door; I belong to that prison, and mess close to the door; there were eighteen or twenty soldiers at the door, but do not know whether they all fired; I saw the muskets levelled; seven or eight shots struck the stairs, and some went to the other side of the prison; at this time there were five or six prisoners going in at the door; one got wounded on the step; I did not see any stones thrown out, but heard afterwards there was one thrown out.

Homer Hull.—(His evidence before the coroner being read to him, he said it was correct.) I am sure I heard Captain Shortland give orders to fire; I was then about thirty or forty feet from him, near gate No. 4, under the platform; he was then facing me; the first fire was a volley; there were no straggling guns preceded the volley; they fired immediately after they got the word; there was no hesitation. I do not think there were more than three or four prisoners in the market square, in front of the soldiers, at the time of the first fire; they had retreated through the gate, and shut it after them.

James Reeves, prisoner, being sworn, says: I belong to prison No. 1. I was rather groggy that evening. I saw a mulatto man, who was groggy, break the chain which fastened the gate No. 1, with a bar like a crowbar; the bar was flat and thick, something like a chisel, about two feet long; the alarm bell was ringing at the time he was breaking the chain, before the gate was broken open. I suppose there were as many as fifty persons around the gate; the pressure they made parted the gate sooner. As soon as the gate was open, a great many rushed through into the square; there were about twelve or thirteen; there were a great many between the two railings; they were all hallooing and making a noise. I went out into the square; I was tipsy, or I suppose I should not have done it. I saw the soldiers coming down; they charged upon us immediately, and I then went back directly. I was pricked. I lost my hat, and went to pick it up, when I was pricked again. I went back with my face to them; some turned their backs; but I stood a little more upon going back than I should have done had I been sober. I received two pricks in the breast, and two in the arm. We shut the gate as soon as we could. Captain Shortland was abreast of the gate No. 1, in front of the soldiers. I am pretty sure he was in front of them. I heard him sing out "fire" twice; heard him order both to charge and fire; can swear I heard him order to fire twice; think Captain Shortland was in front of the soldiers; cannot say how he escaped being shot more than myself. I heard no shouting among the prisoners after the firing. After we were inside No. 1 prison, I watched an opportunity, being mad at being pricked, and flung a stone myself out at the soldiers; the soldiers had fired into the prison before I did so. I saw no stones thrown, nor heard any abuse after the charge and before the firing; but, after the firing, the prisoners ran into the yard, and sung out "fire, and be damned," and dared them. I cried out "fire, and be damned," which I did because I was mad at being pricked for nothing, as I thought. Mr. Magrath, the surgeon, spoke to us, and desired us to go back; he said, if any blame was to be attributed to anybody that we were not sent home, it was not owing to Captain Shortland or the English Government, but to Mr. Beasley. Some did go back in consequence, and if I had been sober I should probably have done so too. This was before any soldiers were in the square.

William Mitchell, prisoner, being sworn, says: I belonged to No. 1; was walking in the yard, as were a great many more, it being very fine; did not know anything particular was going on. I saw Nichols, the turnkey, running down, and a great many prisoners with him singing out "keeno;" they ran out of curiosity, to see what was the matter; I did not know what was the matter. About this time I heard first a single musket, and afterwards a volley, and then more. I asked what was the matter? And was told some boys had made a hole in the wall of No. 7 yard. I said, "what do they fire here for?" I went and helped to shut the inner gate of No. 1, and said we had no business with soldiers there. There were not above thirty prisoners there at that time. The soldiers came in. I saw two officers, and spoke to one, and asked him why he fired upon people who made no resistance? He told me he had been through the hole in the wall himself. Captain Shortland told the prisoners to go to their prisons. The soldiers came in, charged them to their prisons, and wounded several. I did not hear the horn or the alarm bell. The prisoners do not usually go in when the horn first sounds, till the turnkeys come down and tell them to turn in; they first go and lock three doors, and afterwards the fourth and last.

George Challacumb, being sworn, says: I am a carter, belonging to the prison establishment. I went to Plymouth on the 6th of April with a letter; I overtook a man named Roberts on the road, who had been released from prison that morning; he told me his name was Roberts. I entered into conversation with him; he said he was glad he was released, for he thought that in a few days an attempt would be made to break out of prison. I asked him how it would be done? He said there was talk among the ringleaders that it should be at the time the bread wagons went in, when the iron gates were open, and he feared the consequences would be very great; he said that Slater and Jack Crandall were ringleaders of the whole. I did not mention this at Plymouth. It was ten o'clock at night when I returned, and then the affair at the prison had happened. Next morning I told the chief clerk, Mr. Holmden, what I had heard, and advised him not to keep both gates open at once. (There are on the books two such names as Slater and Crandall.)

Lot Davis, prisoner, of No. 5 prison, being sworn, says: I was walking about half way between the hole and the gate. The cook-house of No. 6 was, I thought, the only safe place from the firing; I tried to get into No. 5, but could not, and remained in the cook-house until next morning. I heard scattering guns firing after the prisoners were all running away, as if fired at single persons crossing the yard.

Samuel Best, turnkey, being sworn, says: On opening the door from the railing towards the receiving house, on the morning of the 5th April, about half-past seven o'clock, a prisoner said to me, "Well, turnkey, how did you like the keeno yesterday?" I told him I did not know anything of it, having been away; but, from what I heard, they had acted very improperly; he said, "damn you, in a quarter of an hour we can have all the bloody walls down." I turned round, and the conversation ended. No other prisoners joined in these expressions; several were round, waiting to go into the receiving house. On the 6th inst., in the evening, when all was quiet after the affray, Mr. Mercer, who assisted in the dispensary, said he hoped the prisoners would not attempt anything again; I replied, it would be quite madness, as they were unarmed, and hoped they would be reconciled. He said it might be different if they were to make another attempt, as they would not be taken by surprise again; and intimated, as I understood, that they had upwards of three hundred pistols and five hundred files, which I understood were sharp and fastened on pieces of wood, and enough gunpowder to blow up the walls. I heard the next day a prisoner say, on the other side of the wall, if they could have got one hundred muskets, they would have been better pleased, or would have done better, or something to that effect.

David Spence Warren, prisoner, being sworn. (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was all true, and that he had nothing to correct.) I was within seven or eight feet of Captain Shortland when I heard him give orders to fire; I was inside my own prison yard, and Captain Shortland was close to the gate; that was the first firing I heard; there had been none before. Soldiers had broken up their line when Captain Shortland led them into the prison yard. Captain Shortland was at the head of them, in front of them all, when I heard him tell the men to fire. They did not fire the first time he said "fire;" it was about a minute afterwards before they fired. He said "fire" three times; the last time he caught hold of a musket, and turned it towards a man standing opposite him, saying, "God damn you, fire." I cannot swear that that musket was fired. The firing commenced at first by one musket, then two, and afterwards a general fire. I am sure the firing did not begin by a volley. I am sure what I state is true. There had been no firing before I saw Captain Shortland take hold of the musket; I had heard none. I saw no prisoners have hold of this musket at the time. Captain Shortland, when he told them to fire, was in front; one soldier beside him. They might have fired at his side, or over him, without hurting him.

Richard Walker, private in the Derby militia, being sworn, says: I was one of the south guard on the evening of the 6th; I was in the market square when the firing began, on the right of the north guard; when it began, there was not a prisoner in the square; when the soldiers charged there were a great many in; cannot say how many. They went back to their own yard directly; was formed nearly on a line with the north guard. After the charge the prisoners returned to the gate, and tried to force it; they made a great noise, and used very abusive language; they did not come back into the market square. I heard no order to fire; first one musket was fired; it was by a sentry posted at the bottom of the square, in consequence of the prisoners abusing him. I saw this; I cannot say I saw the prisoners take hold of his musket. I saw them throw no stones before, but after it was fired they did; one hit me on the arm. I might not have seen it had the prisoners caught hold of his musket. It might be two minutes before there was firing again. As soon as the prisoners threw stones, there was more firing. They fired several together, but not in a volley. Do not recollect I heard any order to fire. Heard several call out "fire," and supposed it might be the prisoners who were calling out. I heard the word "fire" repeated, but do not know by whom. I was close enough to hear the prisoners call out. Saw Captain Shortland come down, break through the guard, and order them to cease firing; this was very soon after the firing began. He called out to the prisoners, "For God's sake, men, go in, go in." The soldiers did the same. Captain Shortland came down the square from behind the line, broke through the guard, and ordered them to cease firing. I did not know where he was before the firing.

William Ward, private in the Derby militia, being sworn, says: I was not in the market square when the firing began; I came up just after. Captain Shortland, after it had continued some time, came up, and ordered the soldiers to cease firing; they immediately ceased. He said to the prisoners, "For God's sake, all of you go in;" the whole of the soldiers said the same. The prisoners ran up to the gates after that with a stronger force than before, making a great noise, but not insulting the soldiers. Saw no stones thrown. When Captain Shortland gave orders to cease firing, they did so immediately; afterwards the prisoners came up in large bodies; there was more firing; I did not see any prisoners come into the square after that. I do not know who ordered the firing afterwards; I heard Captain Shortland order the soldiers to cease firing; he ran from behind the line to the front, and held up both his hands, saying, "For God's sake, cease firing."

William Norris, turnkey, being sworn, says: I was not in the market square before the firing ceased. I came into the front yard, and was told by a turnkey in the lodge that the prisoners had made a breach. I ran to it, and some soldiers came to relieve the sentry at the hole. The prisoners were abusing him, and daring him to fire, saying his orders were not to fire. I saw Captain Shortland at the breach; he said the prisoners must have some bad intention. He came round by the military way to the front of the gate, and ordered me to ring the alarm bell, which I did; he was then in front of the upper gate, between it and the lodge; this was previous to any knowledge of the bursting the gate. When I had rung the alarm bell, I went to the military way; one musket was fired first, and afterwards there was a general fire; after which Captain Shortland and some officers called for the turnkeys; I ran through the line; he told me to take a wounded man to the hospital, which I and two others did. I returned to the market square; he ordered me to take another; he was dead. I took him to the burying house. The wounded man was brought out of No. 1; the dead man I found in the square. I was afterwards employed in carrying away the wounded.

John Rodd, turnkey, being sworn, says: I blew the horn for locking up, on the evening of the 6th; blow it always for about a quarter of an hour; I did so that evening; I went down afterwards to lock up No. 4 prison; while at the doors of it, I heard the alarm-bell ring; as soon as the prisoners hear the horn, they generally begin to go in; they did so that night; they were going into No. 4 quite fast; they rushed out again, up to the gates, to see what was the matter; they ran up the yard; I cried out that night, as I went down the yard, "Turn in, turn in; the alarm-bell is rung to assemble all the department." I came back into market square, and when I got there, there was a firing, and a cry for the turnkeys; I came, and assisted to carry the wounded men to the hospital.

Daniel Nicholls, turnkey, being sworn, says: I was in prison yard No. 1, to lock the doors; the horn had done sounding before; before I came to the first door to lock up, the alarm-bell rang; the prisoners were going in just as usual; but, when the alarm-bell rang, they called out to know what was the matter, and thronged so much to the door that I could not shut it; I proceeded towards the gate, but, before I reached it, the firing commenced; I was about half-way up the yard when it began; hearing a ball whizzing by me, I returned to the end of the prison, and waited some time, till, seeing the lamplighter get over the wall by his ladder, I thought it a good opportunity for me to get over also, and did so; I came round to the market square; Captain Shortland was calling for turnkeys, and I went to assist in carrying the wounded to the hospital; the firing had ceased in the market square when I reached it; I heard much firing afterwards in the prison yard; when I came to lock up the second time, the prisoners threw a stone at me from No. 1, and the sentry then fired in at the door; I do not know who the sentry was; they shoved the door to, and would then open it again, and throw out stones, before I could fasten it; I cannot say whether the door was open when the sentry fired.

David Pitmore, turnkey, being sworn, says: The first I heard of the affair was a call for the guard; I went to the lodge, when Captain Shortland ordered the alarm-bell to be rung; I staid at the top of the yard till I heard a call for the turnkeys, and I then assisted in carrying away the wounded men; was at the lodge before the alarm-bell rang; I saw the soldiers charging the prisoners back; they drove them out under the platform; saw the first firing; several prisoners rushed into the square before the charge; I do not think there were any in the square before the alarm-bell rang; afterwards a gate was open, and they were coming through.

John French, turnkey of prison No. 3, being sworn, says: I was going to lock up as usual on the evening of the sixth, after the horn had sounded; I was in the yard; the prisoners were going in very quietly; had locked one door, and then heard the alarm-bell; the prisoners asked what was the matter; I said I did not know; I continued locking up, and locked three doors; this went on till the firing began; I stood at the end of the prison, and then got over the wall by the lamplighter's ladder; I did not see the prisoners come out of No. 3 after the firing began; came round to the market square; the firing was then over there; after assisting to carry the wounded to the hospital, I went to lock up No. 3; the soldiers fired in the door of that prison; I told the prisoners to go in; they were in the doorway, and I touched them slightly with my hand, telling them to go in and let me shut the door, or the soldiers would fire; one of the soldiers touched one with his bayonet, and advised the same, or they should fire; one man told him he might fire and be damned; immediately an order was given to fire by somebody behind—whether by an officer or non-commissioned officer, I do not know, and several muskets were fired into the open door, (I cannot say how many,) upon which I saw some prisoners drop; do not know who ordered to fire; sentries said to them, "If you do not go in we must fire on you;" they said "Fire and be damned;" I believe only one said so; there were many soldiers about the door; cannot say whether the soldiers could have driven them back by their bayonets, without firing, so as to have enabled me to shut the door; the soldiers were about eight feet from the door when they fired; I was in front, and got back as quick as I could, and bent down as they fired.

James Carley, turnkey, being sworn, says: I came to the front of the iron gate in the military walk; saw Captain Shortland coming from the barracks with soldiers; he made a halt at the blacksmith's shop; I saw prisoners rushing towards the gate No. 1, between the two railings; they sang out "keeno;" I ordered out the bread wagon, then in the market square; I opened the gate for the purpose; as soon as the wagon was out I heard a bar knock against No. 1 gate; I called out to Captain Shortland that the prisoners were breaking out; he went down with the military with both his hands in his breeches pockets; the prisoners were rushing out, but I could not see how many there were, the military being between them and me. I staid till I heard a cry for the turnkeys; went down to assist in carrying the wounded; I saw a charge, but do not know whether it made the prisoners go back.

Samuel Morgan, turnkey of No. 7, being sworn, says: After the horn had sounded I was in Nos. 5 and 7 yards, going to lock up. No door was locked when the alarm-bell rang. When I first went into the yard there was a great crowd of prisoners round a hole in the wall; as I passed by they sang out "keeno," and they and others in the yard ran towards the railings, near the market square; about this time there were nearly seven or eight hundred prisoners in the yard; many belonged to other yards; I took no notice. When I got to the cook house the bell rang; they asked me what was the matter; I said I did not know; I passed on, and when I had shut one door I heard a firing; the prisoners seemed to retreat then. I got over the railings into the military way by the lamplighter's ladder. There were then three doors of the prison open. I saw no stones thrown by the prisoners, being at the lower part of the yard, where there was no tumult. I came round to the market square when the firing was over; only a few muskets were fired afterwards; but did not see any while I was in the military walk. I saw the sentries fire from the ramparts. I then helped to carry away the wounded, seeing others do so. After locking up prison No. 7, which I did without difficulty, I went to No. 1, to shut up, and, when putting one of the doors to, stones were thrown out; I was struck by one on the breast, and by one on the chin; I was pulling the inside door to; no muskets were fired into it then.

William Wakelin, turnkey of No. 5, being sworn, says: I had locked three doors of No. 5, when I heard a great noise, and the word "keeno" several times. On entering the prison yard there was a great body of prisoners between prison No. 7 and the barrack wall, round where the hole was; there were not more than usual round the railing. As usual, some prisoners were going in, and some kept coming out: there was nothing unusual in their manner at the bottom of the yard. I was coming up towards where the noise was, when a bullet hissed by close to me. I then ran towards the ramparts to get out of the way. I got over the wall by the lamplighter's ladder; then I came round to the market square, where I saw the soldiers drawn up in ranks. I went down, and heard Captain Shortland call out for the turnkeys. I assisted to carry the wounded. The prisoners brought a wounded man from No. 1, and insisted on carrying him up themselves; Captain Shortland ordered them to go back, but, as they refused, he put out his hand, and pushed one of them, without using violence; they would not go, and the soldiers were obliged to charge on them; one man pulled open his clothes, and challenged them to fire; Captain Shortland pushed him, but it was not with violence. This man was very turbulent; his name is James Reeves. Afterwards I went to lock up No. 5; then all was quiet, and the prisoners were all away from the door.

Richard Arnold, turnkey, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was all perfectly correct.) Captain Shortland, at the time of the first fire, was in front of the line of soldiers, and it was almost impossible for him, had they fired a volley, to escape death himself. He was persuading the prisoners to go back when I told Captain Shortland they were making a hole in the wall; he told me to call the guard, but did not use any oath, nor did he blame me for not telling him of it before.

John Arnold, steward at the contractor's store for the prisoners in health, being sworn. (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was correct, and that he had nothing material to add to it.)

Stephen Hall, turnkey, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was correct.) One of the iron bars mentioned therein was bent; the bars appeared to him to be some of those from the railings.

John Tozer, being sworn. (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was correct, and that he had nothing to add to it.)

Massacre at Dartmoor Prison.

Henry Wroe, plumber and glazier at the prison establishment, being sworn, says: I saw the sentry at the breach charge down his musket, and several stones thrown at him, while he kept telling the prisoners he must fire. I was then on the south guard platform. I went to the platform, at the foot of the market square, and saw about six or seven hundred prisoners at the hole; and presently they sung out "keeno," and ran towards the railing; they rushed in under the platform. Seeing this, I left the platform, and was going up the market square; before I was half-way up I heard them knocking the chain of No. 1 gate, which soon burst open, and a great number (I cannot say how many, but suppose about five or six hundred) rushed into the square. I did not see Captain Shortland or the soldiers come into the square. The prisoners had broken the lock before they came in; it was done before I left the square; the alarm-bell rang after I left it. Being called again, he said: he does remember to have told Captain Shortland that the gate was burst; Captain Shortland was then in the military walk, near the turnkeys' lodge, standing alone, without the guard; he did not hear him give any order in consequence. It might be a minute or so before Captain Shortland went into the square.

John Mitchell, clerk to Captain Shortland, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said that it was correct, and he had only to add as follows:)

While I was on the platform observing the prisoners throwing peat at each other, as I stated in the deposition, between the wall and the iron railings, I observed a great body of prisoners round the place where the breach was, but they were so numerous that I could not see what was doing. When I went with the turnkeys to remove the wounded, I observed Captain Shortland exerting himself as much as a man could do for them, and in having them conveyed to the hospital; he desired me to procure turnkeys to remove a wounded man who was sitting in a sentry box, and desired me to exert myself as much as possible in having the wounded removed; the cry of the military for the keys Nos. 5 and 7 was from those who had not been active, and appeared to me to proceed from anxiety to secure the prisoners, not from any vindictiveness: this party did not fire while I was in the yard with them; they called for the keys for the purpose of shutting up the prisoners.

Robert Holmden, first clerk to Captain Shortland, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was correct.) I saw a great body of prisoners at the breach; the prisoners had broken the gate of No. 1, next the market square, before the alarm-bell rang; I was with Captain Shortland when the report of it was made to him; it was made by Henry Rowe; whereupon Captain Shortland, who was a great deal agitated, said, "Where are the guards? where shall we get help?" and I advised ringing the alarm-bell, which was done.

Robert McFurlane, assistant surgeon, being sworn. (His evidence before the coroner being read to him, he said it was all correct.)

John Bennett, store clerk, being sworn, says: I was at the breach; the prisoners were using very abusive language. I saw no stones thrown. I proceeded down the military walk; I was very near Captain Shortland, near the blacksmith's shop in the military way; several people reported to Captain Shortland that the prisoners were forcing the gate, and he then ordered the alarm-bell to be rung; he went into the square with the guard; I heard Captain Shortland tell the prisoners in the market square to go back to their different prisons, and say how sorry he should be to use force; he remonstrated with them; this seemed to have no other effect than to produce the most infamous language from them; some minutes after a musket went off, and soon after many others; I was then so near Captain Shortland that I am sure I should have heard it had he given orders to fire, but I did not, nor did I hear an order from anybody. I did not see the charge. I heard Captain Shortland order the soldiers to advance. Captain Shortland said, in my hearing: "My good fellows, go to your different prisons, or the military must do their duty." I suppose the prisoners in the square must have exceeded some hundreds when Captain Shortland went in with the guards.

George Magrath, surgeon of the hospital, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said he had nothing to add to it, but felt it his duty to say:)

As some imputation of inebriety has been made against Captain Shortland, I think it justice to say, that, having observed him on the evening of the 6th, no man could be more free from it; and from my acquaintance with him, and with his general habits in his family, I do not think any man can be more abstemious. I should consider it equally incumbent on me, as imputations of barbarity have been made against him, to say, that, whenever I had occasion, as often happened, to make representations to him of any arrangement calculated for the health and comfort of the prisoners, he has always adopted it with great alacrity, and shown every disposition to do everything for their welfare.

George Holland, bugler of the Derby militia, being sworn, says: I recollect sounding the bugle on the evening of the 6th, in consequence of the prisoners breaking the wall; several officers of the Somerset passing backwards and forwards in the military way said the prisoners were breaking down the wall, and were breaking out of the gates and getting out, and every person would be killed, and told me on that account to sound a fire on the bugle, which I did; before this, a considerable time, there had been firing, and I am sure not four men would have known anything about the sounds of the bugle if they were asked now.

Massacre at Dartmoor Prison.

DARTMOOR PRISON OF WAR,
Monday, April 24, 1815.

Met, pursuant to adjournment, at 8 o'clock.

Present: Paul Treby Treby, Esq.

John Collard, sergeant in the first Somerset militia, being sworn, says: I was on the north guard, commanded, on the evening of the 6th, by Lieutenant Avelyn. Some one belonging to the department came and told me to call out my guard, saying, "Fall in your guard as soon as possible, and march it up to the west yard," and that that guard was going to the barrack yard where the breach was. I fell in the guard, and marched them up opposite the west guard, where I halted them; I was not there long before Captain Shortland came up; he ordered me to take the guard to the market square and form it across; had seen nothing before this of what had passed. On entering the market square, I heard a chain rattle at gate No. 1, on the left hand side. I formed the guard across the square; the guard was at the west guard-house before the alarm-bell rang; it rang a little at first, stopped, and then I heard Captain Shortland order it to be rung again. This was before we went into the square; it was not rung again till we were going in. I observed two or three prisoners come out of gate No. 1, from the prison yard, just as I entered the market-gate; a greater number had entered before the guard formed; whilst it was forming I ordered the two sentries in front of the railings at the bottom, and the two on the platform above, to leave their posts and join the guard; they were all that were at those situations. As soon as they heard me thus order, the prisoners began to cry out "keeno," and rushed into the square in as great numbers as they possibly could, through the gate which had been broken. By the time I had formed my guard they came up in great numbers, close to us, on our left flank; the guard gave way on the left, where it was weakest, and where the prisoners made the greatest efforts to pass; the soldiers were then at the shoulder, when the guard gave way. Captain Shortland ordered it to charge; he told off about fifteen file himself, whom he ordered to charge; repeated it two or three times before they did; they endeavored to drive them back, but did not charge the same as they would an enemy; if they had they must have killed scores of them, as every bayonet would have told; they tried to drive them back without committing murder; the right of the guard did not charge; we drove them back about half the ground they had gained in the square. I was in the rear of the charging party; only the fifteen file told off charged in this way at first; the prisoners then began to throw stones at us in great numbers from within the railings and from the market square; there were some scores still in the market square; they were hurraing at the same time. An order was then given to fire on them; I heard the word given to fire by some one; I think the word given was in my rear; we were in great confusion; I was then in the rear of the soldiers; the prisoners were crying out "fire;" I could not then see Captain Shortland; I did not look out for him; I had something else to think of when the order to fire was given; two or three men fired; immediately they obeyed the order; one musket was discharged first, and one or two very soon after. When these were discharged I did not see any man killed, or any one hurt among the prisoners; I think the soldiers fired over their heads; then some prisoner or prisoners said, "You buggers, why do you not fire? you have nothing but blank cartridges." Afterwards the firing became general, and the prisoners were driven into the yard. I heard no word of command for the second firing; the firing was not in a volley, but in small numbers at a time. There was no general return of the prisoners from the yard after the firing had taken place; they could not stand the firing; they could not come without being murdered, the whole of them; they did not rally after the firing became general. I do not know how long the firing continued; but after it had gone on some time the prisoners dispersed into their yards; then Captain Shortland ordered the firing to cease. I am sure he did. He put up his hands, and said "cease firing," giving it as a word of command; it then ceased generally in the market place. As soon as possible a party of soldiers was ordered into the prison yards to turn the prisoners into their different prisons. I know nothing of what happened afterwards in the prison yard, as I remained in the square with the rest of the guard. I afterwards heard some firing in the yard, but paid no attention to it. I think the firing must have ceased from the ramparts soon after, otherwise some of our soldiers in the yard must have been shot. The general tenor of the prisoners' conduct was riotous. Many of our men were much hurt by the stones thrown, but not so as to be disabled from doing duty. I am satisfied, in my own mind, that, without the firing, the prisoners could not have been driven back. Had we charged on them like an enemy, we must have killed a great number; every bayonet must have killed one or more prisoners, they being so thick. The number of soldiers in the square, at the first firing, was about fifty-four, exclusive of sergeants; our guard was about thirty-eight, and there were about fourteen of the west guard. I cannot say how many came in afterwards. The whole regiment assembled as soon as possible after the alarm; no officer gave orders to cease firing before Captain Shortland; had there been such an order, it would have been obeyed.

Stephen Laphorn, private, in the first Somerset militia, being sworn, says: I was on the north guard on the evening of the 6th; went into the market square with it; when I first went in I saw two or three prisoners in the square near No. 1 gate; about one hundred and fifty came in afterwards, while we were forming; they pressed up very near the military; some of the military were ordered to charge, which was done; some prisoners went back in consequence, but others were coming through the gate upon us. Before the firing began they had never been entirely driven out of the square. I heard an order given to fire, but do not know who gave it; it came from the right in front; I was on the left. I did not see Captain Shortland at this time; I cannot say whose voice it was; am not sure whether it was from the prisoners or the military. The firing began immediately from about the centre; it did not begin by one musket, but by several together. When the firing began, I was at the charge; two prisoners seized my bayonet, and tried to twist it off; I do not know who they were. I told them to let go; they said they would not, adding, "fire, and be damned." I got myself in danger, and was obliged to fire to get my musket released; I did so; but there were upwards of twenty fired before mine; saw a great quantity of stones thrown before my firing; while we were at the charge the prisoners threw them till the last; one man stooped to pick up his cap, which, I believe, had been knocked off by a stone; this was before any firing. I do not think the prisoners would have been driven back without firing; as they continued pressing on, Captain Shortland was persuading them to retire, but they would not, saying they were not prisoners of war. I heard Major Jolliffe give orders to cease firing before they were driven into the prison yard, and before the firing ceased in the market square. I think he did so as soon as he came down; he was not there at first. Stones were thrown, and the firing continued in consequence after this order. I also heard several voices say "cease firing," but cannot say whether they came from the military or from the prisoners.

William Gifford, private in the Somerset militia, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was all correct.)

I heard Captain Shortland say "cease firing," about a few minutes after it began; he put his hand up by way of signal, and said so; I do not know who gave the word to fire; I did not see where Captain Shortland was when the order was given to fire; I think he had just gone towards the left, and the word appeared to me to come from the right, therefore I think it could not have been he who gave it; I did not hear first one musket discharged; the firing at first must have been in the air, otherwise there must have been more prisoners hurt. Captain Shortland was running up and down when the word was given to fire; I heard no order given by any body else than Captain Shortland to cease firing; I do not know that it would have ceased had orders been given; the prisoners were throwing stones and bricks continually; the firing ceased for a few minutes, after Captain Shortland had ordered it to cease; the conduct of the prisoners was such that it made us afraid, from the stones thrown; and I do not think they could have been driven back without the firing. Had orders been given by anybody else to cease firing, it might not have been heard, from the noise.

John Soathern, private in the Derby militia, being sworn, says: I was one of the south guard on the evening of the 6th; was one of those formed across the square on the right of the north guard; I saw the prisoners charged down nearly to the railings; our guard charged down to the railings after the north guard. We went close to the railings; my bayonet touched them; when we got there, the prisoners began throwing stones; we stepped back a few paces, being so near the railings; one stone struck me on the right side; it almost knocked me down; I should have fallen had not a man kept me up; just then the firing commenced; after some time of firing Captain Shortland came in front, and said, holding his hands up, "For God's sake, men, cease firing—cease firing." He went near to the railings; I and several others called to him, "Come back, it is almost dusk;" he said "You know me, men; do cease firing;" but several muskets were discharged after this. Captain Shortland was not near me when it commenced; I did not see him; the order to fire was given at the left, and it passed through the ranks one after another, saying "fire, fire," but there was so much noise and shouting by the prisoners, that it is impossible for me to say who gave the word; I believe I was the sixth or seventh file from the right; I remained in the market square; I do not know what passed in the prison yard; I heard no officer before Captain Shortland say "cease firing;" but a few seconds afterwards some officers did. I did not see any prisoners in the market square when the firing began, but they were behind the railings under the platform, throwing stones; I could not see about gate No. 1, there being sentry boxes between.

Lieutenant Avelyn, of the first Somerset militia, being sworn, says: I commanded the north guard on the evening of the 6th; I came into the market square with Captain Shortland; the prisoners had burst No. 1 gate, and were rushing through in a great crowd when we went in, so that I thought the whole of them were coming out; Captain Shortland went forward to speak to them. I heard him saying "My good fellows, do go back;" I did hear him say that, but the prisoners were making so much noise that I could not distinguish much of what he said; he also called to me not to suffer the prisoners to come too near my guard; they were then pressing forward in a very threatening manner; the guard was formed across the square, about the middle; my guard was then about thirty-eight men, and there were some others; the prisoners were so pressing on my guard, that many on the left fell back several paces, in order that they might not come too near them; they were then not close up to the wall, but I made them form close up afterwards; the left of my guard charged, and I was with them, driving the prisoners back; they did not charge by my order, nor did I hear Captain Shortland order it; I considered myself under Capt. Shortland's orders; had I been alone, I certainly would have charged the prisoners long before, or rather have fired, conceiving it to be necessary from the threatening manner of the prisoners, and the great body of them which was coming up, and could soon have surrounded my guard. They were not quite driven out of the square by the charge; it was during this charge that I heard the first musket fired; I could not see where it was fired from, not being near enough, and being so much engaged in driving the prisoners back; it was, I think, to my right; at the first there was a single shot, and almost instantly after several others were fired; I heard no distinct order to fire; many of the prisoners were crying out to fire, and defying the soldiers; I was very near Captain Shortland at the time, and think I should have heard him had he given the order; I heard no distinct order at first, or at any time, to fire; Captain Shortland was then near gate No. 1, to the left, in front of the soldiers, and it would have been madness in him to have given the order in that situation. I was in front when the firing commenced, and retired into the rear for my own safety; the prisoners retreated on the firing taking place; I gave orders to cease firing after some time; my guard then ceased, and I went to the front of the men; I did not hear anybody else give orders to cease firing before myself, neither Major Jolliff nor Captain Shortland; the noise was so great that I could not hear; I am certain, had any one man by chance fired, the irritation of the soldiers, from the stones thrown at them previously, was then so great that almost the whole of them would have followed; the prisoners did not appear to care for the bayonet, and I do not think, from the state they were in, they could have been driven back without firing. The charge was not made with violence, as against an enemy; the prisoners were struggling with the soldiers; many defied them; but others said they could not go back, as the press was so great; I remained in the market square; did not go into the prison yard; I kept my guard with me; one prisoner, after the firing was over, came up, opened his clothes, and dared the soldiers to fire; I do not think the prisoners generally were intoxicated, but resolute. I do not think any man could have behaved like Captain Shortland who was intoxicated, and I think he behaved with courage and humanity.

Ensign Samuel White, of the first Somerset militia, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said he had nothing to add or alter.) I do not know of any order to the soldiers on the ramparts to fire, but suppose they took it up from the others; I suppose there might have been about half a dozen of my guard in the market square; there was no firing through the breach.

Lieutenant Fortye, one of the first Somerset militia, being sworn, says: I had the command of the south guard on the evening of the 6th; I went into the square with my guard after the north was in, and formed on their right; they were already formed and in the act of firing when I arrived; that guard was then about fifteen or twenty feet from the iron railings; there were no prisoners in the square between my guard and the railings; could not see to the left, on account of the north guard; my guard took up the firing from others without any orders, immediately after they had formed in support of the north guard;

as soon as we formed I ordered the firing to cease; as soon as it could possibly be restrained, I stopped it; it ceased almost immediately; I saw nobody else endeavor to stop the firing before; as soon as the prisoners had retired to their yards, my guard ordered their arms, remained where they were, and I remained with them; I cannot, therefore, speak to anything that took place afterwards.

James Greenlaw, late second officer of the Prince de Neufchatel, American prisoner, being sworn: (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was all correct.) I was between the two railings under the platform when I heard Captain Shortland give the order to fire; I saw him then at the head of the troops, about the centre of the yard, close in front of them; when I heard the word to fire, I retreated into yard No. 4; had just got inside the gate when it began; it began immediately by a volley, not by a single musket; I am sure it began by a volley; I do not know how Captain Shortland escaped; I suppose he knew how to take care of himself, and that his own men would not fire on him; he appeared to me to be standing close to the soldiers; I saw no stones thrown before the firing began; I do not know that I could have seen them; the prisoners were trying to get into No. 3 quietly, when the soldiers fired into it; I did not see any resistance among them. (This prisoner has a midshipman's warrant in the United States Navy, and a furlough.)

John Slater, citizen of the United States, being sworn, says: I do not know an American prisoner named Roberts; I have been confined here above six months; I know of no concert among the prisoners to break out by force, only attempts of individuals to escape at different times; I was at the gate No. 7; I was passing between Nos. 6 and 7 with two more men, when a party of five soldiers, I think, crossed at the further end of the prison from us; one man named Washington fell, but whether from the firing of this party, or from the ramparts, I do not know; he fell against me and knocked me down; I got up and ran away to my own prison, No. 5; there were only three prisoners on the spot where he was shot; the shot went through his temple.

Enoch Burnham, citizen of the United States, being sworn. (His evidence before the coroner was read to him, and he said it was all correct, and that he had nothing to add to it.)

Alexander Marshall, citizen of the United States, being sworn, says: I belong to prison No. 1; there were not more than fifty prisoners in the square when the soldiers charged; they charged as upon an enemy; they began firing, and I ran to No. 1 gate to get to my prison, but was nearly ten minutes before I could, on account of the press of the prisoners; there were about four hundred soldiers in the market square.

Cornelius Rowe, citizen of the United States, being sworn, says: I belong to No. 1 prison; I went to the breach; those about it told me it was made to get back a ball; they afterwards ran towards the gate No. 7, saying it was to shut it against the military; I saw the military come down the square, and heard Captain Shortland order them to charge; at which time there were about forty or fifty prisoners in the square; I made towards my prison, and just as I got into the yard there was a firing, and the prisoners were rushing as fast as possible to their own prisons; they shut the gate behind them; there were about one hundred and fifty soldiers in the square.

William Dewetter, citizen of the United States, being sworn, says: I ran towards the gate to see what was the matter; on arriving, I saw the soldiers charge; I turned round, and just as I got inside the inner gate shots were fired; one grazed the side of my head, which made me giddy, and turned me round two or three times; I saw a prisoner named Mann fall; went to him and took him up; the balls flew about so thick that if there was one I suppose there were one thousand.

Thomas Tindale, citizen of the United States, being sworn, says: I was under the platform; saw the soldiers coming down the market square, and heard Captain Shortland give orders to fire; he was then about the centre, and in front of the soldiers; he had on a blue coat, but without epaulettes; he had a drawn sword in his hand; he gave orders twice to fire; I was not ten steps from him when I heard him; I heard every word he said; I saw him plainly; the firing commenced by one musket first, then two, and afterwards a whole volley; the firing began when Captain Shortland gave the word the second time; I heard Captain Shortland tell the soldiers to fire low; he was then still in front of the soldiers; I believe he was standing before the muzzles of the foremost muskets; the soldiers were formed two deep; when the balls began to fly thick, I escaped into No. 3, and saw no more of what passed afterwards; when I heard the order to fire, I was about the middle of gate No. 4; the soldiers charged up to the railings, and then fell back four or five paces, when Captain Shortland gave the order to fire.

John C. Rowles, citizen of the United States, being sworn, says: I saw forty or fifty prisoners in the market square when the soldiers were drawn up.

Thomas George Shortland, captain royal navy, commanding at the depot, being sworn, says: On the evening of the 6th April, a little before seven o'clock, Mr. Holmden, first clerk, came to my house and informed me there was a disposition of the prisoners to be riotous, as they had got between the railings and wall of No. 7 yard, and there were a number of people collected in No. 7 yard; in consequence, I walked down to the upper gates: on coming there, I was informed the prison barrack wall had been breached. I went to that yard and saw a large hole, and the military guarding it under an officer whom I since knew to be Lieutenant Avelyn; on getting to the breach I observed the prisoners using an iron bar to enlarge it. I remonstrated, and told them it was the prison barrack yard, and that it would be dangerous for them to attempt to force it; the prisoners shouted, and threw stones through the breach, and still continued at times to enlarge it. I then heard some one say, "They are breaching the wall above the cook house in the prison barrack yard," and nearly at the same time there was a call out that they were forcing the lower gates, while I was still in the lower barrack yard. I immediately left the yard, and Lieutenant Avelyn followed me, leaving the breach with a party and a sergeant; when I arrived at the blacksmith's shop, I saw a rush of prisoners between the iron rails under the platform; the gate was at this time forced, and the prisoners were without the gates, in the market square, where they were not allowed to be; seeing this, and having in my mind the breach in the barrack wall, and the reported breach above the cook house; bearing this in mind, with the reported threats that had been constantly told me that the prisoners would liberate themselves on or before the 10th April, I ordered the alarm-bell to be rung: at this time part of the west guard, which is called the piquet, had gone round to turn the prisoners out of the railway in No. 7 yard, and another part of the same piquet was in the prison barrack yard; so that the force was reduced to the north guard only. Lieutenant Avelyn formed that guard and marched down into the market square. I preceded them, and about half-way down the guard formed in a line, this keeping their left close to the hospital wall; at time I should suppose there were from four to five hundred prisoners in the market square. I was perfectly unarmed, and went down to remonstrate with them, using all the persuasions in my power to make them return to their prisons, stating that the military guard was formed above them, and it was dangerous to attempt to use force. I was, at this time, about six paces in front of the guard; the prisoners kept still pressing up, and pressing me on the military; they appeared to want to get round the left of the military, keeping close to the hospital wall. At this time I looked back, and said, "For God's sake, soldiers, keep your ground;" bearing in mind that there was not a single soldier above these to prevent escape through the outer gates; almost immediately, about twelve or fifteen soldiers charged down towards No. 1, towards the hospital gates, about five or six paces, and they returned into line again. I was still at this time in front, and had gone forward again, urging the prisoners, who had retreated, when a discharge of musketry took place; while I was in that position, being to the right of the centre of the guard, and not near the hospital wall, a musket ball grazed my temple in that discharge, when I retreated into line with the soldiers; the prisoners retreated and advanced again, and about this time Major Jolliff came down. There was a call of "wounded men" from the prisoners, upon which I called to the turnkeys to assist in passing the wounded through the line of military, as they would not allow the prisoners to pass with them. While this was doing, there was another discharge both to my right and left. Those near me did not fire at this time, as, whenever I could, I had requested them to desist; the turnkeys came down, (this was after the second discharge,) and I was busily employed with Mr. Mitchell in directing the removal of the wounded up to the hospital. I can say nothing more of discharges of muskets in the market square. I only observed two discharges there. I heard some from the prison yards and from the ramparts. I was in the market square the whole time till the firing ceased, when Major Jolliff came down to the market square. I gave myself no further thoughts to the military, my whole mind being occupied in directing assistance to the wounded. I repeatedly said to the prisoners, "For God's sake, go to your prisons," previously to the firing, and between the discharges; for, being between the soldiers and them, I was warned by some of the former to keep clear of their fire, otherwise I should be shot. After the firing had ceased, and I got the receiving house door open to receive the wounded, I went into the north prison yard to see the prisoners shut up; the turnkey (Nicholls) of No. 1 had got them all in, but the door was not secured, but which was soon effected by the military without firing. All the troops were marched out before I saw anything more: I was in my undress uniform, and was perfectly unarmed. I never did give an order to fire; and in support of this I can say, I stated in my official letter to General Brown, that Major Jolliff gave the orders to fire, conceiving he had done so, from seeing the major appear at that moment. Indeed, in a former conversation with General Brown, in the presence of Major Gladding, being asked whether, if an attempt were made to resist the authority of the depot, I should order the military to fire, I told General Brown, as well as the major, that I did not think myself authorized to command the military to fire, because it was their duty to do it when they thought it necessary. I do not recollect a suspension of the ringing of the bell and then commencing again; it was a continual ringing. I ordered it in consequence of seeing that the prisoners had broken through the breach in the wall and the other reported breach. I did not hear any order to fire; it must be understood that I was with the prisoners, who were making a great noise, hurraing and rioting at the time.

The two best prisons (as the prisoners call them) are the two smallest, and I do not conceive them to be the best, as the others are the most roomy, and have been put in a state of repair since the release of the French prisoners; those two (which are Nos. 2 and 6) have not. Being smaller, we keep one of them for a receiving prison for any draughts of prisoners who may come in of a sudden wet and fatigued; the other, when Doctor Baird, inspector of hospitals, was down, he requested might be reserved for particular cases of contagion, as a sort of quarantine receiving house for newly arrived prisoners, to prevent contagion spreading; the prisoners have been distributed nearly according to the directions of Doctor Baird, (he having power to alter the distribution on his visits.) The provisions of all the prisoners were stopped by the transport board's direction, for undermining the prisons. I remonstrated with them that the innocent would suffer with the guilty; but they replied that it must be so, as in all general transactions of the kind. I was not out of the market square until all the firing had ceased; I was not in No. 7 yard until an hour after the whole was over. Gatchell's statement, about my running down that yard, is not true. I recollect a man coming up the market square with a wounded man, and after being told to go away he would not, and I gave him a push; he said that I must recollect I had struck him, but I made him no answer. Taking into consideration the apparent temper and resolution of the prisoners, and my remonstrances having no effect, I do not think they could have been driven back without firing; without the firing, I think they might have forced the guard, which they were in the attempt to do; if that guard had been forced, the depot would have been lost. On all occasions when the market was stopped, or any measure of the kind was taken, it was reported to the Transport Board, along with the reasons for it, and they sometimes directed the stoppage to be continued. I am in the habit of reporting it after it is done. (Captain Shortland read the copy of a letter to the Transport Board, dated 14th February, 1815: it states, that, in consequence of the escape of Simon Hayes, who had been directed by the board to be kept in close confinement in the Cachot, and his taking refuge among the prisoners, and the disorderly conduct of the prisoners in not allowing the lamplighters to do their duty, he had stopped the market; and he read their answer, dated 16th February, approving of the measure in consequence of the reasons he stated.) The market has not been stopped more than twice. The first time was on the 24th October, 1814, on account of the prisoners not permitting themselves to be counted out of their prisons in the morning, which was necessary to ascertain if there was any escape. In a letter of the 27th, the board approved of the measure. In consequence of this, and the riotous conduct of the prisoners, Captain Shortland stated several arrangements he had made since he came to the depot for the welfare of the prisoners; among others, the following. On one occasion, when orders had been sent to remove the stoves from the prison, on account of the health of the prisoners, he wrote a very strong letter to the board, urging that they might be retained, as they were very instrumental to the comfort of the prisoners. All the letters from prisoners to himself he opened and answered, and he keeps a clerk for the mere purpose of keeping accounts of moneys received for the prisoners.

He dates the commencement of the antipathy of the prisoners to him from the time when he got the Transport Board to prosecute some men for tattooing others; and states, that till that he was on good terms with them, going down at all times among them, as he used among the French prisoners.

Massacre at Dartmoor Prison.Deposition of John C. Clement.

I sailed from New York the 9th January, 1813, on board the brig Star, Captain Reed, for Bordeaux, and was captured on the 9th February following, in the Bay of Biscay, by His Britannic Majesty's ship Superb, (74,) Honorable Sir Charles Paget, commander. Went into Basque Roads, where, with other prisoners, I was put on board the Warspite, (74,) Captain Sir Henry Blackwood; proceeded in her to Plymouth, (England,) and on 19th March was sent on board the Hector, prison ship. On the 2d April, two hundred and fifty of us, American seamen, were marched to Dartmoor prison, where we were stowed in among nine or ten thousand French prisoners, who were in a filthy, dirty condition. During our confinement, Shortland, the keeper, repeatedly stopped our markets for several days at a time, without any provocation, or giving any reasons for this conduct, and our provisions were repeatedly short, not having our full allowance issued us. Shortland attempted several times to give us bad bread and provisions, and was guilty of many acts tending to irritate us, and render our situation very uncomfortable. On the 5th of April last, particularly, he gave orders to the contractors to serve us bad bread, which the prisoners would not receive, and, at the usual hour of closing the prisons, the turnkeys came to shut us in for the night; but we proceeded in a body to the market square, where an officer of the guard, on our representations to him, (Shortland then being absent to Plymouth,) advised us to return to our prisons, and he would have the bread sent us; which was done, and we retired to rest about twelve at night.

On the 6th of April, (the following day,) at 6 P. M., while a number of American prisoners were playing ball in yard No. 7, where a small hole, the size of a large pane of glass, sufficiently large to admit a boy or small man to pass through, had been made by some person or persons for the purpose of obtaining the ball when it flew over the wall into a large yard enclosed by high walls, (wherein the soldiers were stationed in the barracks:) at 6 P. M., as before mentioned, Captain Shortland, the keeper, entered the gate of No. 1, with 250 or 300 soldiers, armed with muskets and bayonets, the alarm-bell ringing at the same time, when he (Shortland) ordered one of the soldiers to fire at the prisoners in yard No. 1: the soldier not willingly obeying, he snatched a musket from one of them, and shot a prisoner. The soldiers then commenced firing on the prisoners, who were then sallying out of their prisons to learn the cause of the firing; the soldiers continuing at the same time to re-load and fire on them. Four or five soldiers proceeded at this time also to the extremity of the yard in pursuit of the flying prisoners, and, as they cried for quarters, they replied, "No quarter shall be given you, you damned Yankee rascals," or similar words, and instantly shot the flying prisoners. Shortland and the soldiers then proceeded to prison No. 3, (No. 2 being empty and closed,) where they fired through the windows and doors on the prisoners inside, and shot through the heart one man while in the act of drinking a can of beer, and wounded another as he was endeavoring to escape up stairs; they then proceeded to yard No. 4, where the second lieutenant, snatching a musket out of a soldier's hand, shot a boy; soldiers firing at the same time into the prison, through the doors and windows. After having received a reinforcement of soldiers they proceeded to yard No. 7, where they commenced an indiscriminate fire on the prisoners while they were flying to escape into their prisons.

On this day there were seven prisoners killed on the spot, and thirty-eight wounded, three of whom died two days after.

On the 7th of April a coroner's inquest was held, composed of American prisoners, (the officers of the prison being present, all save Captain Shortland,) when a verdict of "wilful murder" was brought in. On the 8th the coroner's inquest was held, composed of a number of neighboring farmers, who returned a verdict of "justifiable homicide." On the 9th, Admiral Rowley and a British post captain arrived at the prison from Plymouth, by direction of the Transport Board, to inquire of the prisoners into the transaction. During our confinement the American agent (Beasley) did not give us, say from the 2d April, 1813, to March, 1814, the 6s. 8d. sterling per month, as well as the suit of clothes allowed us annually by our Government, which money and clothes the prisoners have never received; and when I, with two hundred and fifty others, were released from prison, there were likewise a shirt, pair of shoes, and 6s. 8d. due us, which we never received. The prisoners had applied to Beasley repeatedly for what was due them, but received no satisfaction.

He never visited the prisons but once during two years and upwards I was there. The two hundred and fifty prisoners (and among them myself) were released from prison on the 20th of April last, and proceeded to Plymouth, and were put on board the cartel Maria Christiana, and arrived at New York on 5th of June, 1815. I did not know, nor did I hear of a plot or scheme of escape out of prison, as alleged by Shortland, in justification of his attack on us of the 6th April; on the contrary, it is my firm belief, if the gates had been thrown open to us at this time, none of us would have sallied forth to escape, because, being most of us destitute of money, (the agent having withheld our pay;) numbers of us miserably clothed, and without shoes, (also withheld from us;) numbers having walked, when released from prison, barefoot to Plymouth; through fear also of being arrested and closely confined, or, what was more probable, impressed into the British service, at a time when there was a very hot impressment going on in England; because having also heard, some weeks previous, of peace having taken place between Great Britain and America, which would release us from prison.

I know of no cause or reason that can justify the unprovoked attack upon us by Shortland and the soldiery, but do verily believe that the thing was wantonly, wickedly, and maliciously premeditated by Shortland and his officers, to spill the blood and destroy a number of unarmed, defenceless American seamen.

Everything I have stated, I do, to the best of my recollection, believe to be, without the least exaggeration, strictly true.

C

Extracts of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners to Reuben G. Beasley, Esq., American Agent for Prisoners in England, dated

MARCH 6, 1815.

I have received your letters of November 17th, December 21st and 31st last, by the British sloop of war Favorite. I could write you nothing definitive by the return of that vessel, in relation to the arrangements to be made in England for the restoration of our prisoners held there, as I could not, until after the time her despatches left the Seat of Government of the United States, come to an understanding with Mr. Baker, Chargé des Affaires for His Britannic Majesty, as to the terms and manner of restoring the prisoners on both sides under the treaty.

I now enclose you a correspondence begun on the 22d February, and concluded on the 28th, on that subject; by this you will perceive the construction which is given here in relation to this point, and that Mr. Baker has declined in any way to commit his Government; and that, in order to produce as little expense and delay as possible to either Government in the operation, I have given him the election of several propositions, (after he declined to proceed on the principle which I had presumed to exist, and which in his letter of the 23d February he appears to admit;) that each party should restore to the country from which taken the prisoners held by it; and that the proposition he has accepted embraced the transportation of all the prisoners, British and American, at English or American stations in this quarter, at the expense, in the first instance, of this Government; the accounts to be adjusted hereafter, according to justice and the terms of the treaty between the two Governments. Preparations are now actually going on for the immediate removal and transportation of all the British prisoners we now hold in this country; in numbers probably about 3,590, military and maritime.

The question, you will remark, as to the restoration of American prisoners in England, is left open. You are requested, immediately on the reception of this letter, to communicate the correspondence with Mr. Baker to the proper authority of the British Government, to show what is doing here in relation to the delivery and receipt of prisoners of both countries, and to state that the liberal proposition, of taking upon ourselves the transportation both of British and American prisoners, and to make the requisite advances for this purpose, was offered in that spirit of amity which it was deemed, on the happy return of peace between the two nations, to belong to the case; to insure the most speedy relief to the unfortunate men held in durance by either ; and to lessen the expense as much as possible to both Governments ; and with an express reservation of the construction of the treaty, as given here without commitment of the principle contended for by us, that is, that each party should pay the expense of the transportation and delivery of the prisoners held by it ; that the operation will be performed in the most economical manner practicable ; and accurate lists of prisoners and accounts kept for the final adjustment of an account between the two Governments. And you will require of the British Government to transport and deliver all the American prisoners now in England, or elsewhere, not embraced in the arrangement with Mr. Baker, in the most speedy and convenient manner. If this be consented to, (as I trust it will,) you will ask to be permitted to make the same kind of interference which has been afforded here to the British agents, as by the enclosed copy of a letter to Mr. Barton (delegated by Mr. Baker) of the 6th instant.

You will request that the same rations be allowed to our prisoners which are supplied on board ships to the British prisoners about to be transported from this country, and that a sufficiency of sound stores be laid in to supply them for ninety days ; and you will apply for permission to place on board each transport an agent on whom you can rely, who shall have power to inspect the stores and accommodations, and see that the prisoners are regularly and properly supplied. Persons proper for these agencies may, no doubt, be found among the American masters and mates, now prisoners in England, to whom it will be right to make some reasonable compensation for their trouble—say 30 or 40 dollars per month ; and you will instruct each in writing, and direct them to make report, on their arrival, to this office. You will require, also, that the British Government put a surgeon on board each vessel, supplied with a proper quantity of medicine and medical stores, as has been done here.

In the embarkation and distribution, as to the ports of delivery here, you will have examined carefully all the lists ; endeavor, as much as possible, so to assort the prisoners as that each may be placed, as far as is conveniently practicable, nearest his home, or, more properly speaking, to the port from which he sailed ; and, for this purpose, you will designate for the destination of the transports four of our principal ports along the coast ; that is to say, Boston, New York, Norfolk, and Charleston. I have named those near the ocean as being most easy of access, and less liable, on that account, to objection. To prevent complaint, it will be proper, with as few exceptions as possible, to send those prisoners first who have been longest in captivity. There is no other rule that carries so much justice with it ; and it is naturally to be expected that, after such long and severe confinement, the anxiety of our unfortunate citizens, so held, to be released, will be very great ; and preferences out of turn will be viewed with great jealousy and discontent.

It remains to point out to you what is to be done, should the British Government, under all the circumstances stated, refuse to restore to us our prisoners in England at its expense. After making all proper efforts on this point, and with as little delay as possible, should you fail, there will be nothing left (having first protested in a respectful but firm manner against such refusal, should it happen, and giving notice that an accurate account will be kept of all expenditures made by us, in this part of the transaction, for future adjustment under the terms of the treaty) but to take the most speedy and effectual measures of transporting them, at the expense of this Government, in the first instance at least, to the United States.

I have been particular in my instructions in this letter in endeavoring to anticipate alternatives, and to put you fully in possession of my ideas on all the points that occur to me at present, in order that you may be prepared to proceed, immediately on its reception, in some one course, without a moment's delay. The operation you will have to perform, whatever course be taken, is one of much consequence in every view ; important to the Government, in affording the most speedy relief possible to our countrymen placed in the hands of its late enemy by the fate of war ; highly interesting to these unfortunate men, whose anxiety to return to their country and friends must increase with the knowledge of the end of the war, and the expectation that nothing but forms and want of opportunity now retard their departure ; and of great consideration to the commercial interest of the United States, to have restored to it so many valuable seamen with as little delay as possible.

Your zeal and activity are, therefore, fully counted on, to do all that may depend on you to conduct this business to the best advantage, in all its bearings, and with the requisite economy.

I particularly recommend that you do not permit the interchange of sentiments, in negotiation with the British Government, as to the mode and expense of transportation, to be spun out. It will be expected that it will be prompt in deciding on the course it may determine to take in that matter. You will be readily able to show the necessity of an immediate decision.

From the Commissary General of Prisoners to George Barton, Esq.

OFFICE COMMISSARY GEN. OF PRISONERS,
Washington, March 6, 1815.

SIR : Having been referred to you by Anthony St. John Baker, Esq., Chargé des Affaires of His Britannic Majesty in the United States, in relation to the steps necessary to be taken to carry into execution the restoration of the prisoners of war, American and British, held in the United States, Canada, Nova Scotia, and the West Indies, according to the understanding which has taken place between him and myself, (of the nature of which you are apprized,) I have the honor to inform you that orders, some days ago, have been given for the immediate march of all the Massacre at Dartmoor Prison.

British prisoners captured on land or the lakes to the frontiers of Canada, to be delivered at or near Odletown, and for the immediate embarkation, in commodious vessels, of all the maritime prisoners held at New York, Providence, Rhode Island, Salem, and at any port east of Salem, (comprising all the prisoners, indeed, held at or east of New York,) for Halifax. These will be transported in the public cartel ships Perseverance and Analostan, and an additional private transport ordered to be taken up at Salem. All the prisoners held at New York or Providence will be sent from Providence in the Perseverance or Analostan, whichever is first ready; and those at Salem, or east of it, or at any intermediate port, will be sent in the other public ship, and in the private ship from Salem. The British prisoners at Philadelphia have been ordered this day to be removed to New York, where they will be embarked in the frigate John Adams, armed en flute, for Bermuda. Those who were held in the waters of the Chesapeake have been ordered to be delivered on board the British public ships now in those waters, by an understanding had with the senior officer, (Captain Clavell, of the frigate Orlando,) and it is presumed, have been by this time received by him. All those in North or South Carolina, or Georgia, will be, as soon as practicable, embarked from Wilmington, Charleston, and Savannah, for Bermuda, in public ships or private transports. As soon as the vessels are designated, which will be in a few days, you will be informed. Orders have been sent to the marshal of Orleans to collect and deliver, forthwith, all the British prisoners in that State, and the adjoining Territories, to the British officer commanding in those waters; and it is presumed they will reach him time enough to dispose of them before your public ships withdraw from that quarter. All these arrangements have been made, or are now in train, as I believe, according to the detail settled in different conversations between you and myself. If there is anything in what I have stated different from your understanding of it, I shall be glad, as far as is in my power, to conform to it.

I have given particular orders that the British prisoners be not put in such numbers on board the vessels transporting them as to crowd them improperly, and am willing, if you think proper, that this shall be regulated by a certain number of men per ton. I have directed that sound and wholesome provisions, and plenty of water, be laid in for them, and served out on the passage in rations, as by the enclosed table; that a surgeon be allotted to each ship, provided with a proper quantity of medical and hospital stores; and I have directed the agents of this office, at the ports from which the prisoners are to be embarked, to make provision on board each ship for the accommodation of an agent, to be put on board by you, if you think proper to do so, to superintend the treatment and accommodation of the prisoners, and to inspect the quantity and quality of the provisions issued to them on the passage; and the masters of the respective ships will be instructed to respect such agents on your part in the performance of the duties assigned them.

In conformity with the request made in your letter of the 25th February, I have directed the marshal of North Carolina, and all the other marshals of the different States having charge of British prisoners, to release all the British prisoners, officers in their districts, respectively, whether of public or private service, who may not choose to wait the sailing of the cartels, and to permit them to leave the country at their option and expense.

I have ordered that all the British maritime prisoners be held and subsisted, as heretofore, at the several depots, until they are regularly embarked. If it be your wish, however, that any portion of these, other than those you have already designated for that purpose, should be discharged in the United States, it shall be done.

I have the honor to be, &c.

OFFICE OF COMM'Y GEN. OF PRISONERS.

From R. G. Beasley to the Commissary General of Prisoners.

LONDON, April 13, 1815.

SIR: I had the honor to receive yesterday your letters of the 15th January, 6th, (two,) and 8th of March. I shall avail myself of the earliest occasion to notice their contents. In the mean time, I have to inform you that I have communicated to the Transport Board the correspondence between yourself and Mr. Baker on the subject of the restoration of prisoners, and have called on them to undertake the transportation to the United States of our prisoners in this country. Prior, however, to the receipt of your letter on this subject, I had engaged in this port nine ships for the conveyance of our prisoners, several of which have sailed for Plymouth to take them on board. I, in the first instance, endeavored to engage vessels at Portsmouth and Plymouth; but the turn of affairs in France having induced this Government to take up transports for the conveyance of troops, I could obtain none in those ports.

It is with extreme regret I have to state, that on the 6th instant the guard of the depot at Dartmoor, by order of the agent, fired on the American prisoners, killed five, and wounded thirty-four. I transmit, herewith, two reports of this unfortunate affair, (one from the Transport Board, and one from the Admiralty Office, through the Foreign Office.)

By the latter you will perceive that the prisoners are accused of having attempted to liberate themselves by force, and are stated to have been urged to this by the impression they were under that their own Government had neglected to provide means for their early conveyance home.

As the prisoners have been constantly informed of the exertions made by me for their release, and as on this occasion I had written twice to let them know the number of vessels taken up for their conveyance home, and the time they might be expected at Plymouth, it is difficult to believe, under such circumstances, that this is really the cause of this melancholy occurrence. I shall, therefore, inquire most minutely into all the circumstances attending it, and shall communicate the result to you, as also the names of those who have been killed and wounded.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

R. G. BEASLEY.

TRANSPORT OFFICE, April 10, 1815.

SIR: I am directed by the Commissioners for the transport service, &c. to acquaint you, that, by a letter this day received from Captain Shortland, the agent for prisoners of war at Dartmoor prison, it appears that on the 6th instant the American prisoners confined at that depot made a breach in the prison wall, and attempted to liberate themselves, by making a violent attack on the guard; and that it became indispensably necessary, in order to quell the revolt, for the guard to fire upon them; in consequence of which five of the prisoners were killed and thirty-three were wounded.

I am further directed to observe, that it is much to be lamented that the extreme impatience of these unfortunate men to be discharged, at a time that measures were in a train for their liberation, should have produced such melancholy consequences. I am, &c.

FOREIGN OFFICE, April 11, 1815.

SIR: I lose no time in transmitting to you the copy of a letter which I have received from Mr. Crocker, of the Admiralty, giving a circumstantial account of the alarming riot which broke out on the 6th instant amongst the American prisoners of war confined at Dartmoor, and of the measures which it became necessary to pursue for the purpose of restoring order; and I am directed by Lord Castlereagh to request that you will take an early opportunity of forwarding this statement of the unfortunate event to your Government.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

J. P. MORIER.

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq.

From J. W. Croker to J. P. Morier.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, April 10, 1815.

SIR: My Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty think it right to acquaint Lord Castlereagh that, on the evening of the 6th instant, a very alarming riot broke out among the American prisoners of war confined at Dartmoor. The rioters, it appears, endeavored to overpower the guard, to force the prison, and had actually seized the arms of some of the soldiers, and made a breach in the walls of the depot, when the guard found itself obliged to have recourse to their fire-arms, and five of the rioters were killed and thirty-three wounded; after which the tumult subsided, and the depot was placed in a state of tranquillity and security.

Admiral Sir J. T. Duckworth, Commander-in-Chief at Plymouth, having received information of this unfortunate event, lost no time in directing Rear-Admiral Sir Josias Rowley, Bart. and K. B., and Captain Shornberg, the two senior officers at that port, to proceed to Dartmoor, and to inquire into the circumstances. Those officers accordingly repaired to the depot, where they found, on examination of the officers of the depot, and all the American prisoners who were called before them, that the circumstances of the riot were as before stated, and that no excuse could be assigned for the conduct of the prisoners but their impatience to be released; and the Americans unanimously declared that their complaint of delay was not against the British Government, but against their own, which ought to have sent means for their early conveyance home; and, in replies to distinct questions to that effect, they declared they had no ground of complaint whatsoever.

Their Lordships think it right to add, that, on the 15th of last month, they directed the Transport Board to take measures for carrying the article of the treaty for the release of American prisoners into effect; and again, on the 30th ultimo, I was directed to write to know what steps had been taken under these directions; and the Transport Board answered, in their letter of the next day, that they had communicated with Mr. Beasley, the American agent, on the subject, who had acquainted them that he had already provided some transports, and was employed in procuring others, for the conveyance of the prisoners to America.

It will be for Lord Castlereagh to judge whether it may not be proper to make a communication on this subject to the American Government.

LONDON, April 15, 1815.

SIR: I enclose a copy of the report of the committee of our prisoners on the lamentable transaction of the 6th instant, which I communicated to you on the 13th, with a statement from the Admiralty office on that subject.

I have transmitted a copy of the report of the committee to Lord Castlereagh, as also affidavits of three prisoners, who were in the prison at the time, and have since arrived in town.

As soon as I can obtain a list of the names of the unfortunate sufferers, it shall be transmitted to you.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Hon. JOHN MASON, &c.

From the Committee appointed to investigate the circumstances attending the massacre at Dartmoor.

We, the undersigned, being each severally sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, for the investigation of the circumstances attending the late massacre, and having heard the depositions of a great number of witnesses, from our own personal knowledge, and from the depositions given in as aforesaid, report as follows:

That, on the 6th of April, about six o'clock in the evening, when the prisoners were all quiet in their respective yards, (it being about the usual time for turning in for the night,) and the greater part of the prisoners being then in the prisons, the alarm bell was rung. Many of the prisoners ran up to the market square to learn the occasion of the alarm. There were then drawn up in the square several hundred soldiers, with Captain Shortland (the agent) at their head; it was likewise observed, at the same time, that additional numbers of soldiers were posting themselves round the walls of the prison yard. One of them observed to the prisoners that they had better go into their prisons, for they would be charged upon directly. This, of course, occasioned considerable alarm among them; in this moment of uncertainty they were running in different directions, inquiring of each other what was the cause of the alarm—some towards their respective prisons, and some towards the market square; when about one hundred were collected in the market square, Captain Shortland ordered the soldiers to charge upon them, which orders the soldiers were reluctant in obeying, as the prisoners were using no violence; but, on the orders being repeated, they made a charge, and the prisoners retreated out of the square into their respective prison yards, and shut the gates after them. Captain Shortland himself opened the gates, and ordered the soldiers to fire in among the prisoners, who were all retreating in different directions towards their respective prisons. It appears there was some hesitation in the minds of the officers, whether or not it was proper to fire upon the prisoners in that situation; on which Shortland seized a musket out of the hands of a soldier, which he fired. Immediately after, the firing became general, and many of the prisoners were either killed or wounded; the remainder were endeavoring to get into the prisons, when, going towards the lower doors, the soldiers on the walls commenced firing on them from that quarter, which killed some, and wounded others; after much difficulty, (all the doors being closed in the interim but one in each prison,) the survivors succeeded in gaining the prisons. Immediately after which, parties of soldiers came to the doors of Nos. 3 and 4 prisons, and fired several volleys into them through the windows and doors, which killed one man in each prison, and wounded severely several others.

It likewise appears that the preceding butchery was followed up with a disposition of peculiar inveteracy and barbarity. One man, who had been severely wounded in No. 7 yard, and, being unable to make his way to the prison, was come up with by the soldiers, whom he implored for mercy, but in vain; five of the hardened wretches immediately levelled their pieces at him, and shot him dead! The soldiers who were posted on the walls manifested equal cruelty, by keeping up a constant fire on every prisoner they could see in the yard endeavoring to get into the prisons, when the numbers were very few, and when not the least shadow of resistance could be made or expected. Some of them had got into No. 6 prison cook-house, which was pointed out by the soldiers on the walls to those who were marching in from the square; they immediately went up and fired into the same, which wounded several. One of the prisoners ran out, with the intention of gaining his prison, but was killed before he reached the door.

On an impartial consideration of all the circumstances of the case, we are induced to believe it was a premeditated scheme in the mind of Captain Shortland, for reasons which we will now proceed to give. As an elucidation of its origin, we will recur back to an event which happened some days previous. Captain Shortland was at the time absent at Plymouth, but, before going, he ordered the contractor or his clerk to serve out one pound of indifferent hard bread, instead of one pound and a half of soft bread, their usual allowance. This the prisoners refused to receive. They waited all day, in expectation of their usual allowance being served out; but at sunset, finding this would not be the case, they burst open the lower gates, and went up to the store, demanding to have their bread. The officers of the garrison, on being alarmed, and informed of the reasons of this proceeding, observed that it was no more than right the prisoners should have their usual allowance, and strongly reprobated the conduct of Captain Shortland in withholding it from them. They were accordingly served with their bread, and quietly returned to their prisons. This circumstance, with the censures that were thrown on his conduct, reached the ears of Shortland on his return home, and he must then have determined on the diabolical plan of seizing the first slight pretext to turn in the military to butcher the prisoners, for the gratification of his malice and revenge. It unfortunately happened, that in the afternoon of the 6th of April some boys, who were playing ball in No. 7 yard, knocked their ball over into the barrack yard, and, on the sentry in that yard refusing to throw it back again, they picked a hole through the wall to get in after it. This afforded Shortland his wished-for pretext, and he took his measures accordingly. He had all the garrison drawn up in the military walk, additional numbers posted on the walls, and everything ready prepared before the alarm bell was rung. This he naturally concluded would draw the attention of a great number of prisoners towards the gate, to learn the cause of the alarm, while the turnkeys were despatched into the yards to lock all the doors but one of each prison, to prevent the prisoners retreating out of the way before he had sufficiently wreaked his vengeance.

What adds peculiar weight to the belief of its being a premeditated massacre, are—

Firstly. The sanguinary disposition manifested on every occasion by Shortland; he having, prior to this time, ordered the soldiers to fire into the prisons, through the windows, upon unarmed prisoners asleep in their hammocks, on account of a light having been seen in the prisons; which barbarous act was repeated several nights successively; that murder was not committed was owing to an overruling Providence alone, for the balls were picked up in the prisons, where they passed through the hammocks of men then asleep in them; he having ordered the soldiers to fire upon the prisoners in the yard of No. 7 prison, because they would not deliver up to him a man who had made his escape from the Cachot, which order the commanding officer of the soldiers refused to obey; and, generally, he having seized on every slight pretext to injure the prisoners, by his stopping the marketing for ten days repeatedly, and once a third part of their provisions for the same length of time.

Secondly. He having been heard to say, when the boys had picked the hole in the wall, and some time before the alarm bell rung, and while all the prisoners were quiet in their respective yards, as usual, "I'll fix the damned rascals directly."

Thirdly. His having all the soldiers on their posts, and the garrison fully prepared, before the alarm bell was rung. It could not, of course, then be done to assemble the soldiers, but to alarm the prisoners and create confusion among them.

Fourthly. The soldiers on the wall, previous to the alarm bell being rung, informing the prisoners that they would be charged upon directly.

Fifthly. The turnkeys going into the yard and closing all the doors but one in each prison, whilst the attention of the prisoners was attracted by the alarm bell. This was done about fifteen minutes sooner than usual, and without informing the prisoners it was time to shut up. It was ever the invariable practice of the turnkeys, (from which they never deviated before that night,) when coming into the yards to shut up, to halloo to the prisoners so loud as to be heard all over the yards, "turn in, turn in;" while on that night it was done so secretly, that not one man in a hundred knew they were shut; and, in particular, their shutting the door of No. 7, which the prisoners usually go in and out at, (and which was formerly always the last one closed,) and leaving one open in the other end of the prison, which was exposed to a cross-fire from the soldiers on the walls, and which the prisoners had to pass in gaining the prison.

It appears to us that the foregoing reasons sufficiently warrant the conclusions we have drawn therefrom. We likewise believe, from the depositions of men who were eye-witnesses of a part of Shortland's conduct on the evening of the 6th April, that he was intoxicated with liquor at the time, from his brutality in beating a prisoner who was then supporting another severely wounded; from the blackguard and abusive language he made use of; and from his having frequently been seen in the same state. His being drunk was, of course, the means of inflaming his bitter enmity against the prisoners, and no doubt was the principal cause of the indiscriminate butchery, and of no quarter being shown.

We here solemnly aver, there was no preconcerted plan to attempt breaking out. There cannot be produced the least shadow of a reason or inducement for that intention, the prisoners daily expecting to be released, and to embark on board cartels for their own native country; and we solemnly assert, likewise, that there was no intention of resisting, in any manner, the authority of the government of this depot.

[Signed by the Committee.]

LONDON, April 18, 1815.

SIR: I had the honor to transmit, on the 13th and 15th instant, two reports on the unfortunate transaction of the 6th instant at Dartmoor prison—the one by the British authorities, and the other by a committee of our prisoners. The latter I lost no time in laying before this Government, and, on the receipt of it, Lord Castlereagh sought an interview with Mr. Clay and Mr. Gallatin, at which it was agreed that each party should appoint a commissioner to investigate the circumstances. If it had suited the convenience of Mr. Clay or Mr. Gallatin to have undertaken it, one of the British Commissioners who signed the Treaty of Ghent would have been appointed to act with him; but as neither of these gentlemen could go, and as my presence here could not be dispensed with at present, they advised me to apply to Mr. Charles King, of New York, who has readily undertaken to act, although it interferes in some degree with his private affairs.

Mr. King left town last evening for Dartmoor, with a Mr. Larpent, who is to act with him.

The result of the investigation shall be transmitted to you as soon as received; in the meantime, I am happy to have it in my power to state that every disposition has been manifested to do what is due to the occasion.

I transmit, herewith, a list of the unfortunate sufferers in this affair.

I also enclose a copy of a letter which I have just received from the Transport Board, relative to the proposals I made, on the receipt of your letter of the 6th ultimo, for sending home our prisoners.

It is proper that I should here remark, that, at the interview which took place between Lord Castlereagh and Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, his Lordship proposed this arrangement, and that these gentlemen advised me to agree to it.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Massacre at Dartmoor Prison.From Alexander McLeay to R. G. Beasley.

TRANSPORT OFFICE, April 19, 1815.

SIR: I am directed by the Commissioners for the transport service, &c., to acquaint you that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have, by their order of yesterday's date, been pleased to signify the consent of his Majesty's Government that the expense of conveying the American prisoners of war from this country to America should be shared by the two Governments, leaving the interpretation of the article in the late Treaty of Peace upon this subject for future explanation; and that the board are accordingly about to take measures for providing vessels for the conveyance of the remainder of the prisoners, understanding that the vessels already engaged by you are calculated to convey about three thousand men. I am, sir, &c..

ALEXANDER McLEAY.

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq.

From R. G. Beasley to the Commissary General of Prisoners.

LONDON, April 30, 1815.

SIR: In my letter of the 19th instant I informed you of the measures which had been adopted here in consequence of the late unfortunate event at Dartmoor prison.

I have now the honor to transmit the copy of a letter addressed to me by Mr. Clay and Mr. Gallatin, relative to that occurrence, and to the transportation of the American prisoners in this country to the United States.

In the absence of Mr. Adams, it becomes my duty to communicate, for the information of our Government, the result of the investigation at Dartmoor. I enclose a copy of the joint report of the Commissioners appointed for that purpose; also a letter from Mr. King to Mr. Adams, and of a list of the killed and wounded on that melancholy occasion.

I shall leave to Mr. Adams any further steps which he may deem it proper to take in this business. I cannot, however, forbear to notice here the erroneous impression of the prisoners, that their detention so long has been owing to me. You are aware, sir, of my constant exertions during the war to effect their liberation. Immediately on the signing of the Treaty of Peace at Ghent, I received my instructions on that subject, proposing, as a condition, that all the prisoners who might be delivered over to me by the British Government should be considered as prisoners of war, and not at liberty to serve until regularly exchanged, in the event of the treaty not being ratified by the President. This proposition was declined, and in a peremptory manner. On the receipt of the intelligence of the ratification from America, I lost not a moment in requesting the release of the prisoners, according to the terms of the treaty; and the number of vessels which I had hired, as mentioned in my letter of the 13th instant, and which are now on their voyage to the United States, will show that the necessary steps were taken to provide for their immediate transportation to their country. The prisoners also, were informed of these measures, and of the exertions which had been made from the commencement to return them to their homes with the least possible delay. Therefore, whatever may have been their uneasiness under confinement, and whatever hostile feelings they may have had towards me, as noticed in the report and in Mr. King's letter, I may say, with confidence, that I could not prevent the one, nor have I deserved the other.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

R. G. BEASLEY.

Extracts of a letter from R. G. Beasley, Esq., Agent for American Prisoners of War in England, to the Commissary General of Prisoners, dated OCTOBER 10, 1815.

"In compliance with the request contained in that of the 5th August, [the Commissary General's letter,] I transmit, herewith, copies of my correspondence with the Transport Board on the subject of the general release of American prisoners in this country on the conclusion of the treaty at Ghent, and on the receipt of the President's ratification; also, copies and extracts of letters informing the prisoners of the measures taken for their release, preceding the occurrence at Dartmoor of the 6th April.

"It was always my practice before requesting, by written communication, the release of prisoners, to urge the measure in person; and this repeatedly, until either it was granted, or there appeared not any hope of success; and then my letter followed, for the purpose of reducing the negotiation to a more official form. This practice I pursued upon the conclusion of the treaty at Ghent, when my request was refused; and again on the receipt of the ratification of the President, when the release was agreed upon. Upon these occasions I, of course, availed myself of every circumstance which I conceived calculated to accomplish the object I had in view; and I frequently found the board concurring with me upon points which, when submitted to the Admiralty, were rejected." "One of my letters, informing the prisoners of the measures taken for their release, was addressed to those on parole at Ashburton, which is about sixteen miles distant from Dartmoor, and with whom the prisoners at this place were in constant correspondence. I have to observe, further, that when inquiry as to the probable time of release was made at my office by friends of prisoners, which at that time was very frequently the case, they were always requested, when writing to them, to desire the information to be made as public in the prison as possible."

SIR: A treaty of peace having been concluded at Ghent between Great Britain and the United States, I am induced, by a desire to shorten the sufferings of the American prisoners in this country, to address the board relative to them. I do this with the more confidence of its being favorably received, as I am persuaded that this wish is equally entertained by the British Government.

I have, therefore, to request that a certain number of prisoners may be released, as soon as I may be able to procure proper conveyances for them to the United States, under the condition that they shall be subject to exchange should the treaty not be ratified by the President of the United States. GENTLEMEN: It appearing by several letters which I have received from Dartmoor, that the prisoners have taken up an idea that any who may have the means of proceeding to the United States would, on application, receive a free discharge, I request that you will make it known throughout the prison that such is not the fact.

There must be other and better reasons to induce me to consent to their release in this manner, at this time. The situation of Europe, under the prospect of another war, multiplies the risk of impressment. I have taken measures to have

STATE OF THE FINANCES.

[Communicated to the Senate, December 8, 1815.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 6, 1815.

In obedience to the acts entitled, respectively, "An act to establish the Treasury Department," and "An act supplementary to the act entitled an act to establish the Treasury Department," the Secretary of the Treasury has the honor to lay before Congress the following report:

I. A cursory review of the financial operations of the Government, in reference to the recent state of war.

II. A view of the finances for 1815, with estimates of the public revenue and expenditures for 1816.

III. Propositions for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit.

I. A cursory review of the financial operations of the Government in reference to the recent state of war.

In order to introduce to the consideration of Congress, with advantage, the measures which will be respectfully suggested, for replacing the finances of the United States upon the basis of a Peace Establishment, a review of the financial operations of the Government, in reference to the recent state of war, appears to be a necessary preliminary.

The restrictive system, which commenced in the year 1807, greatly diminished the product of the public revenue; but it was not until the crisis involved an actual declaration of war, that the augmentation in the expenses of the Government became obvious and important. With the occasional aid of temporary loans the ordinary receipts of the Treasury had exceeded the ordinary expenditures, even during the period of a suspended commerce; and a report from this Department, presenting the estimates for the year 1812, seems to have given the first intimation that the portion of extraordinary expenses, to be incurred for the military and naval service, on account of the then existing state of the country, would raise the demands upon the Treasury to a considerable amount beyond the estimated product of the current revenue. The ordinary disbursements for the year ending on the 30th of September, 1811, were stated as amounting to the sum of $13,052,657 73; and the ordinary receipts, for the same year, were stated as amounting to the sum of $13,541,446 37, independent of a temporary loan raised in 1810, and repaid in 1811, as well as of the balances in the Treasury at the commencement and the close of the year. But the estimates for the year 1812 required, on account of the current expenses, the sum of $9,400,000.

For the Civil and Diplomatic departments - - - $1,260,000

For the Military Department, (including the militia, the Indian department, the charge of arsenals, army, and ordnance, &c.) - - - 3,415,000

For the Naval Department - 2,500,000

And for the interest on the public debt - - - 2,225,000

$9,400,000

And the subsisting revenue to meet these expenses was estimated at $8,200,000, proceeding—

From the customs - - - 7,500,000

From the sale of public lands - 600,000

And from miscellaneous payments - - - 100,000

Leaving a deficit, for which it was proposed to provide by a loan, amounting to the sum of - - - - $1,200,000

Such were the limited objects of expense, and such the limited means of supply, at the commencement of the year in which war was declared. An increase of the expense, and a diminution of the supply, must have been anticipated as the inevitable consequences of that event; but the Government reposed with confidence, for all the requisite support, upon the untried resources of the nation, in credit, in capital, and in industry. The confidence was justly reposed; yet it may, perhaps, be considered as a subject for regret, and it certainly furnishes a lesson of practical policy, that there existed no system by which the internal resources of the country could be brought at once into action, when the resources of its external commerce became incompetent to answer the exigencies of the times.

The existence of such a system would, probably, have invigorated the early movements of the war; might have preserved the public credit unimpaired; and would have rendered the pecuniary contributions of the people more equal as well as more effective. But, owing to the want of such a system, a sudden and almost an exclusive resort to the public credit was necessarily adopted as the chief instrument of finance. The nature of the instrument employed was soon developed; and it was found that public credit could only be durably maintained upon the broad foundations of public revenue.

On the opening of the session of Congress in November, 1811, the legislative attention was devoted to the organization of the Military and Naval Department upon the enlarged scale of the War Establishment; so that the appropriations for this purpose far exceed, in a short time, the estimates and the resources of the Treasury, as they have been already described. Ways and means were, therefore, provided to meet the extraordinary demands thus created; but they were derived exclusively from the operations of foreign commerce and public credit.

1. The Mediterranean fund was at first continued until the 4th of March, 1813, and afterwards until March, 1815, when it became extinct, affording an additional duty of two and a half per cent. ad valorem on all imported goods paying duties ad valorem; and a discriminating duty of ten per cent. upon that additional duty, in respect to all goods imported in vessels not of the United States.

2. There were imposed an additional duty of one hundred per cent. upon the permanent duties on goods imported into the United States, from any foreign place, a discriminating duty of ten per cent. upon that additional duty, in respect to all goods imported in vessels not of the United States; and an additional duty of one dollar and fifty cents per ton (the previous duty being at the rate of fifty cents per ton) upon all vessels belonging wholly or in part to the subjects of foreign Powers. But the continuance of the act being limited to the expiration of one year after the conclusion of the peace, those additional duties will cease on the 17th of February, 1816.

3. An authority was given to raise, by loan, a sum not exceeding $11,000,000, and to create stock for the amount, bearing interest, not exceeding the rate of six per cent. per annum, and reimbursable at any time after the expiration of twelve years, from the 1st of January, 1813. The payment of the interest, and the redemption or the purchase of this stock, are charged upon the Sinking Fund.

4. And an authority was given to issue Treasury notes for a sum not exceeding $5,000,000, bearing interest at the rate of five and a half per cent. per annum, and reimbursable at such places, respectively, as should be expressed on the face of the notes, one year after the day on which the same shall have been issued. The notes were declared to be receivable in payment of all duties and taxes laid by the United States, and all public lands sold by their authority; and the payment of interest, and the redemption or the purchase of these notes were charged, like the funded debt, upon the Sinking Fund.

The effect of the additional ways and means provided by Congress, from time to time, during the late war, may readily be traced. From the report, dated the 1st of December, 1812, it appears that the actual receipts into the Treasury, during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1812, including a portion of the loan, and the issue of Treasury notes, amounted to the sum of $16,782,159 40; (almost double the amount of the previous estimate;) and that the actual disbursement for the same year amounted to the sum of $18,368,325 7. (which was, also, almost double the amount of the previous estimate,) independent of the balances in the Treasury at the commencement and the close of the year. But the estimates for the year 1813 required, on account of the accumulating expenditures, a sum of $31,925,000.

For the Civil and Diplomatic Departments - - - $1,500,000

For the Military Department 17,000,000

For the Naval Department - 4,925,000

And for the interest and reimbursement of the principal of the public debt - - 8,500,000

$31,925,000

And the subsisting revenue to meet these expenditures was estimated at the sum of $12,000,000, proceeding—

From the customs - - - 11,500,000

From the sales of public lands, &c. - - - 500,000

12,000,000

Leaving a deficit, for which it was proposed to provide, first by the outstanding balances of the authorized loan and issue of Treasury notes, and second by a new authority to borrow, and to issue Treasury notes to the amount of - $19,925,000

During the session of Congress, which commenced in November, 1812, and closed on the 3d of March, 1813, the appropriations for the Army, the Navy, and other branches of the public service, were considerably augmented; but, without adverting to the imposition of a small duty upon imported iron-wire, no new source of revenue was then opened, but additional aid was extended to the Treasury by authorizing a repetition of the appeal to public credit.

1. An authority was given to raise, by loan, a sum not exceeding $16,000,000, and to create stock for the amount, bearing interest not exceeding the rate of six per cent. per annum, and reimbursable at any time after the expiration of twelve years, from the 1st of January, 1814. The payment of the interest, and the redemption or purchase of this stock, are charged upon the Sinking Fund.

2. And an authority was given to issue Treasury notes for a sum not exceeding $5,000,000, absolutely, with a provisional authority to issue an additional sum of $5,000,000, to be deemed and held to be a part of the loan of $16,000,000, authorized as above stated to be raised. The notes were to bear interest at the rate of five and two-fifths per cent. per annum, to be reimbursable at such places, respectively, as should be expressed on the face of them, one year after the day on which they should be issued; to be receivable in payment of all duties and taxes laid by the United States, and all public lands sold by their authority; and the payment of the interest, and the redemption or purchase of these notes were charged, like the funded debt, upon the Sinking Fund.

The necessities of the Treasury becoming, however, more urgent, and the reliance on the public credit becoming more hazardous, Congress determined, at a special session, which commenced in May, 1813, to lay the foundation of a system of internal revenue; selecting, in particular, those subjects of taxation which were recommended by the experience of a former period, and computing their general product at the sum of $5,000,000. The continuance of these taxes being limited, at first, to one year after the termination of the war, they acquired the denomination of the "war taxes;" but, by subsequent laws, almost all the existing revenues are pledged, with the faith of the United States, to provide for the payment of the expenses of Government, for the punctual payment of the public debt, principal and interest, according to the contracts; and for creating an adequate sinking fund, gradually to reduce, and eventually to extinguish, the public debt; until those purposes shall be accomplished, or until Congress shall provide and substitute, by law, for the same purposes, other duties, which shall be equally productive. In the session of May, 1813—

1. A direct tax of $3,000,000 was laid upon the United States and apportioned to the States respectively for the year 1814, and it was afterwards subjected to the general pledge above stated.

2. A duty of four cents per pound was laid upon all sugar refined within the United States. The continuance of the duty was limited to one year after the war; and, as the general pledge has not been applied to it, the duty will cease on the 17th of February, 1816.

3. A duty was laid upon all carriages, for the conveyance of persons, kept by any person for his own use, or to be let out for hire, or for the conveyance of passengers; which was graduated according to the denomination of the carriage, from the yearly sum of $20, to the yearly sum of $2. The continuance of this duty was originally limited to the war; but the general pledge has been applied to it, with some modifications in the mode of laying and collecting the duty.

4. A duty was imposed on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors, which was graduated according to the capacity of the still, the time of employing it, and the materials consumed. The continuance of this duty was originally limited to the war; but the general pledge has been applied to it, with considerable modifications in the principles and provisions of the law.

5. A duty was laid on sales, at auction, of merchandise, and of ships and vessels, at the rate of one per cent. of the purchase money of goods, and of twenty-five cents for every hundred dollars of the purchase money of ships and vessels. The continuance of this duty was originally limited to the war; but the general pledge has been applied to it, with a considerable addition to the amount, and a modification of the provisions of the law.

6. A duty was laid on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, graduated according to the place of retailing, and the nature of the article retailed. The continuance of this duty was originally limited to the war; but the general pledge has been applied to it.

7. A duty was laid on notes of banks, and bankers; on bonds, obligations, or promissory notes, discounted by banks or bankers; and on foreign or inland bills of exchange, above $50, and having one or more endorsers; graduated according to the nominal amount of the instrument. The continuance of this duty was limited to one year after the war; and as the general pledge has not been applied to it, the duty will cease on the 17th of February, 1816.

But besides the direct tax and the internal duties, there were added to the resources of the Treasury, during the session of May, 1813—

8. A duty of twenty cents per bushel upon all salt imported from any foreign place into the United States, which, being limited to the war, and not being included in the general pledge, will cease on the 17th of February, 1816.

9. And an authority to raise, by loan, a sum not exceeding $7,500,000, and to create stock for the amount, reimbursable at any time after the expiration of twelve years from the 1st of January, 1814. The rate of interest was not limited by the law; but it was provided, that no certificate of stock should be sold at a rate less than eighty-eight per cent., or $88, in money, for $100 in stock. The payment of the interest, and the redemption or the purchase of this stock, are charged upon the Sinking Fund.

The sources of the revenue thus opened in 1813, could not, however, be expected to aid the Treasury until 1814; and, accordingly, in the annual report from this department, dated the 8th January, 1814, neither the direct tax, nor the internal duties, will be found as an item of the actual receipts into the Treasury, during the year ending the 30th of September, 1813. The amount of those receipts was stated in the proceeds of the customs of the sales of public lands, &c., at $13,568,042 43, and in the proceeds of loans and Treasury notes at $23,976,912 50, making together $39,907,607 62; and the actual disbursements of the same period were stated at $32,928,855 19, independent of the balances in the Treasury at the commencement and the close of the year. But the estimates for the year 1814 required a sum of $45,350,000.

For civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses - - - - -	$1,700,000
For the payment of interest on the old and new debt, and the instalments of the principal of the old debt - - -	12,200,000
For the Military Establishment - - -	24,550,000
For the Naval Establishment - - -	6,900,000
	46,350,000

And the subsisting revenue to meet these expenditures was estimated at the sum of $14,370,000, proceeding—

From the customs and sales of public lands - - - - -	$6,600,000
From the internal duties and direct tax - - - - -	3,500,000
From a balance of loans and Treasury notes - - - - -	4,270,000
	14,370,000

Leaving a deficit, for which it was proposed to provide, 1st, by a part of the balance in the Treasury, and, 2d, by loans and Treasury notes, amounting to 30,980,000

State of the Finances.

For the deficit thus approaching the sum of $40,000,000, the only provision made during the session, which commenced in December, 1813, rested again upon the public credit.

1. An authority was given to issue Treasury notes for a sum not exceeding $5,000,000, absolutely; with a provisional authority to issue an additional sum of $5,000,000, to be deemed and held to be a part of any loan which might be authorized during the session. The notes were to bear interest at the rate of five and two-fifths per cent. per annum; to be reimbursable at such places respectively, as should be expressed on the face of them, one year after the day on which they should be issued; to be receivable in payment of all duties and taxes laid by the United States, and all public lands sold by their authority; and the payment of the interest, and the redemption, or purchase of these notes, were charged, like the funded debt, upon the Sinking Fund.

2. And an authority was given to raise, by loan, a sum not exceeding $25,000,000, and to create stock for the amount, reimbursable at any time after the expiration of twelve years from the last day of December, 1814. Neither the rate of the interest, nor the price of the stock, was limited; and the payment of the interest, and the redemption or the purchase of the stock, are charged upon the Sinking Fund.

The embarrassments of the Treasury, after the adjournment of Congress in the year 1814, became extreme. It appears that the disbursements, during the first half of that year, had amounted to the sum of $19,693,781 27.

For the civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses -	$1,444,762 60
For the Military Department -	11,210,238 00
For the Naval Department -	4,012,199 90
For the public debt -	3,026,580 77
	$19,693,781 27

And the balance of the appropriations for the same objects of expenditure required, during the other half of the same year, was stated at the sum of - 27,576,391 19
47,270,172 46

But the actual receipts into the Treasury, during the first half of the year 1814, had amounted to $19,219,946 33, proceeding—

From the customs -	4,182,088 25
From the sale of public lands, (including those in the Mississippi Territory, the proceeds of which are payable to the State of Georgia,) -	540,065 68
From the internal duties and direct tax -	2,189,272 40
From postage and incidental receipts -	166,744 00
From loans -	9,679,676 00
From Treasury notes -	2,426,100 00
	19,219,946 33

And it was estimated that there would be received from the same sources of revenue, (including loans and Treasury notes to the amount of $8,320,000,) during the other half of the same year, the sum of - 13,160,000 00
32,379,946 33

To this amount add the balance of the cash in the Treasury on the 1st of July, 1814 - - - 4,722,639 22

And the estimated aggregate of the funds to meet the demands on the Treasury to the close of the year 1814, was the sum of - 37,102,585 55

Leaving a deficit for the service of 1814, after absorbing all the cash of the Treasury, amounting to the sum of $10,167,586 91

To supply this deficit of $10,167,586 91, to provide an additional sum for the contingencies of the year, and to accelerate the fiscal measures, which were essential to the prosecution of the war in 1815, the interposition of the Legislature was deemed indispensable. The plan of finance, which was predicated upon the theory of defraying the extraordinary expenses of the war by successive loans, had already become inoperative. The product of the revenues had ceased to furnish an amount equal to the expenditure of the former Peace Establishment, with an addition of the interest upon the debt contracted on account of the war. And the sudden suspension of specie payments at the principal banks established in the different States, (however it may be excused, or justified, by the apparent necessity of the case,) had exposed the Government, as well as private citizens, to all the inconveniences of a variable currency, devoid, alike, of national authority and of national circulation. The Treasury could no longer transfer its funds from place to place; and it became, of course, impracticable to maintain the accustomed punctuality in the payment of the public engagements.

Under these circumstances, the Congress was convened by the special call of the President, in September, 1814, when the citizens of every occupation and pursuit seemed eager to second the legislative efforts to replenish an exhausted Treasury, and to renovate the public credit. Commerce continued to contribute, perhaps, to the extent of its capacity. Agriculture, though suffering the want of a vent for some of its important staples, was every where prepared for the requisite exertion. Domestic manufactures, which had scarcely surmounted the first struggle for existence, yielded to the patriotic impulse; and the capital of individuals, in all its variety of form, offered a ready tribute to relieve the necessities of the country. Thus, during the session which commenced in September, 1814, and closed on the 3d of March, 1815—

1. The following internal duties were increased in their amount; the duties were rendered permanent, and the general pledge was applied to them:

(1.) The direct tax was raised to an annual sum of $6,000,000, and it was extended to the District of Columbia.

(2.) The duty on carriages was raised, and a duty on the harness was added.

(3.) The duty on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors was continued, and a duty on the spirits distilled was added.

(4.) The duties on sales at auction, and on licenses to retail wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, were raised.

(5.) The rates of postage were raised fifty per cent.

2. The following new duties were permanently laid, and the general pledge was applied to them. But it was, at the same time, declared, that so long as the duties imposed on the articles of domestic manufacture should continue to be laid, the duties then payable on the like description of goods imported into the United States, should not be discontinued or diminished.

(1.) Duties on various articles, manufactured or made for sale within the United States or their Territories, as specified in the annexed table, marked B.

(2.) Duties on articles in use, to wit:

On household furniture, the value in any one family (with certain exceptions) exceeding $200 in money, according to a scale graduated from $1 on a value of $400, to $100 on a value of $9,000.

On every gold watch kept for use, $2.

On every silver watch kept for use, $1.

But, besides establishing these sources of revenue, (and others were contemplated at the period when the Treaty of Ghent was announced,) Congress sought to confer upon the Treasury the means of anticipating the collection of the duties, of recovering the punctuality of its payments, and of inviting the co-operation of the moneyed institutions and moneyed men of the United States, in plans for restoring a uniform and national currency. With these views various measures were sanctioned.

1. An authority was given to raise, by loan, a sum not exceeding $3,000,000, (particularly destined to provide for the expenditures of the last quarter of the year 1814.) and to create stock for the amount, reimbursable at any time after the 31st of December, 1814. No limitation was prescribed as to the rate of interest, or the price of the stock, but it was declared that, in payment of subscriptions to this loan or to loans authorized by any other act of Congress, it should be lawful to receive Treasury notes becoming due on or before the 1st of January, 1815, at their par value, together with the interest accrued.

The payment of the interest, and the redemption, or the purchase of the stock to be thus created, were charged upon the Sinking Fund, but the act contained these further assurances. 1st. That, in addition to the annual sum of $8,000,000, heretofore appropriated to the Sinking Fund, adequate and permanent funds should be provided and appropriated during that session of Congress, for the payment of the interest and the reimbursement of the principal of the stock; and, 2d, that an adequate and permanent sinking fund gradually to reduce, and eventually to extinguish the public debt contracted during the war, should also be established during the same session of Congress.

2. An authority was given to anticipate the collection and receipt of the duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors, and on distilled spirits, by obtaining a loan upon the pledge of the duties to an amount not exceeding $6,000,000, and at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum. And a similar authority was given to raise a like sum, at the same rate, by the pledge of the direct tax.

3. An authority was given to issue Treasury notes for so much of the sums authorized to be borrowed under the acts of the 24th of March, and the 15th of November, 1814, as had not been borrowed, or otherwise employed in the issue of Treasury notes; provided, that the whole amount should not exceed the sum of $7,500,000. And, by the same act, an authority was also given to issue a further sum of $3,000,000, to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the expenses of the War Department. The Treasury notes, issued under these authorities, were in all respects similar to the prior issues of Treasury notes, except that the payment of the interest, and the reimbursement of the principal, were not, as heretofore, charged upon the Sinking Fund, but upon any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

4. An authority was given to issue and re-issue Treasury notes for a sum not exceeding $25,000,000, upon principles essentially different from the prior issues.

(1.) These Treasury notes might be of any denomination. If they were of a denomination less than $100, they were to be payable to the bearer, to be transferable by delivery, and to bear no interest. This denomination has acquired the designation of "Small Treasury Notes." If they were of the denomination of $100 or upwards, they might conform to the foregoing description, or they were to be payable to order, to be transferable by endorsement, and to bear interest at the rate of 5 2-5 per cent. per annum. This denomination (of which only notes for $100, bearing interest, have been issued) has acquired the designation of "Treasury notes of the new emission."

(2.) The principal and interest of these Treasury notes are not payable at any particular time, but the notes are everywhere receivable in all payments to the United States.

(3.) The holders of "small Treasury notes" may exchange them, at pleasure, in sums not less than $100, for certificates of funded stock, bearing interest at seven per cent. per annum, from the first day of the calendar month next ensuing that in which the notes shall be presented to the Treasury of the United States, or to a commissioner of loans, for the purpose of exchange.

State of the Finances.

(4.) The holders of "Treasury notes of the new emission" may exchange them, at pleasure, in sums not less than $100, for certificates of funded stock, bearing interest at six per cent. per annum, from the first day of the calendar month next ensuing that in which they shall be presented to the Treasury of the United States, or a commissioner of loans.

(5.) The stock, thus created by the exchange of Treasury notes of either denomination, is reimbursable at any time after the 31st of December, 1824, and it is charged upon such funds as had been, or should be, established by law for the payment and reimbursement of the funded public debt contracted since the declaration of war.

5. An authority was given to raise, by loan, a sum not exceeding $18,452,800, and to create stock for the amount, reimbursable at any time after the expiration of twelve years from the last day of December, 1815. Neither the rate of interest nor the price of the stock was limited; but it was declared that there might be received in payment of subscriptions to the loan, such Treasury notes as were actually issued before the passing of the act, and which were made by law a charge on the Sinking Fund. And the payment of the interest, and the reimbursement on the purchase of the principal of the stock are charged upon the Sinking Fund.

6. It was declared that any holder of any Treasury note issued, or authorized to be issued, under any laws previously passed, might convert them into certificates of funded debt, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum.

7. And it was declared that it should be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid the interest upon Treasury notes which have become due and remain unpaid, as well with respect to the time elapsed before they became due, as with respect to the time that shall elapse after they become due; and, until funds shall be assigned for the payment of the said Treasury notes, and notice thereof shall be given.

The progress of expenditure and of revenue for the entire period of the war is thus developed, and, independent of the balance of the appropriations for the year 1814, which is transferred to the accounts for the year 1815, the subject may be reduced to the following general abstract:

But, as the receipts of the Treasury for the year 1815 are derived principally from the war revenue and resources, and as its expenditures arise, also, principally from the arrearages of the war demands, it is proper to comprise them, as far as they are ascertained, in the following supplemental statement:

1. The gross receipts of the Treasury for 1812, 1813, and 1814, amounted, as above stated, to the sum of $98,042,309 96. The receipts of the Treasury for 1815, to the 30th of September last, cannot be precisely stated, as the accounts to that time are not yet actually made up; but they are estimated to have amounted to the sum of - - - 39,372,000 00

It will be natural here to inquire into the general effects of the war upon the public debt of the United States; and the annexed table, marked C, exhibits a detailed statement of the unsatisfied amount, on the 1st day of January, annually, from the year 1791 to the year 1815, both inclusive. The subject, however, may be placed distinctly in the following point of view, upon estimates referring to the date of the 30th of September, 1815:

Of the Public Debt.

2. The amount of the funded debt contracted before the late war, which remained unsatisfied on the 30th of September, 1815, may be stated at the sum of $39,135,484 96, to wit:

3. The amount of the floating debt contracted since the commencement of the late war, calculated to the 30th of September, 1815, may be stated at the sum of $17,355,101, to wit:

Of this aggregate there has been subscribed in

And it is estimated that there has been paid on account of duties and of the customs, the internal duties, and the Leaving the amount of floating public debt, in Treasury notes, on the 1st of October, 1815, about the sum of - - - - 16,205,101 00

But to this amount of the public floating debt, in Treasury notes, there must be added the following temporary loans, to wit:

(1.) A temporary loan,

Bank of Boston in 1812, payable the 15th and 31st of December, 1814, but unpaid 500,000 00

New York, payable in the year 1817 - - 350,000 00

amount of the floating public debt about the

RECAPITULATION.

1. The amount of the unsatisfied funded public debt, contracted before the war, on the 30th of September, 1815, was the sum of - - $39,135,484 96

2. The amount of the funded public debt contracted, in reference to the late war, on the same day, the sum of - - - 63,144,972 50

3. The amount of the floating public debt, contracted since the war, was, on the same day, the sum of 17,355,101 00

State of the Finances.

Total of the ascertained amount of the public debt created since the war, to the 30th of September, 1815 - - - - - $80,500,073 50

Total amount of the national debt on the 30th of September, 1815 - - - - - 119,635,558 46

It is proper to remark, that the aggregate of the national debt thus stated to the 30th of September, 1815, is subject to considerable changes and additions. The floating debt in Treasury notes is convertible, at the pleasure of the creditors, into funded debt; and, independent of a direct application of the current revenue to discharge the Treasury notes, as well as the temporary loans, there must be a great, though gradual reduction of the floating debt, by the payments made in Treasury notes, for duties, taxes, and public lands. There are, indeed, some claims known to exist for loans, supplies, and services, during the late war, which have not been liquidated, or are not embraced by existing appropriations; and doubtless there are other legal and equitable claims which have not yet been brought into view, in any form, at the accounting departments, but which may eventually receive the sanction of Congress. It is not, however, within the scope of any estimate hitherto made, to state the probable addition to the funded debt, under all circumstances, at more than $7,000,000, which would consequently place the aggregate of the funded debt, created in consequence of the war, at a sum not much exceeding $70,000,000. But it may be important to recollect, that the war debt has not been entirely incurred for objects limited to the continuance of the war; and that the military and naval establishments in particular have derived durable advantages from the expenditures of the Treasury.

For the payment of the interest, and the reimbursement or gradual extinguishment of the national debt, the resources of the Treasury are abundant, although the state of the circulating medium (which will be more particularly considered hereafter) has rendered it impracticable to obtain at all times, upon reasonable terms, the local currency of some of the places appointed for the discharge of the public engagements. These resources depend upon the Sinking Fund, connected with the faith of the United States, which is pledged to supply from the existing, or from other subjects of revenue, the deficiencies of that fund.

The Sinking Fund.

The public debt amounted, on the 1st of January, 1791, to the sum of $75,463,476 52, and it consisted—

Of the foreign debt - - -	$12,812,821 92
Of the domestic debt - - -	62,650,654 60
	75,463,476 52

The foreign debt experienced various changes in form and in amount. From 1792 to 1795 it rose above the amount stated for 1791, but from that period it was gradually reduced; and on the 1st of January, 1801, it stood at the sum of $10,419,000. From the year 1801, however, the annual reduction was more rapid; and in the year 1810 the foreign debt became extinct.

The domestic debt has also experienced various changes in form and amount. It was originally stipulated that it should be subject to redemption by payments, not exceeding in one year, on account both of principal and interest, the proportion of eight dollars upon one hundred dollars of the stock; and when the Sinking Fund was constituted and organized, provision was made for effecting the payments in that proportion, until the whole debt should be extinguished by dividends payable on the last days of March, June, and September, in each year, at the rate of one and a half per cent, and, on the last day of December, in each year, at the rate of three and a half per cent. upon the original capital. During the first period of about ten years, from 1791, until the 1st of January, 1801, the amount of the domestic debt never fell below the sum which has been stated; and in 1801 it stood at about the sum of $72,619,050 80. The augmentation, created on account of the purchase of Louisiana, (amounting to $15,000,000,) raised the capital of the domestic debt, in 1804, to the sum of $80,691,120 88; but from that period there was a considerable annual diminution of the amount, until it was reduced on the 30th of September, 1815, to the already specified sum of $39,135,484 96.

The Sinking Fund, by whose operations these beneficial effects have been produced, may be regarded as coeval with the organization of the present Government; but it has undergone many important modifications.

1. The early appropriations of the revenue were confined to the payment of the interest and instalments of the foreign debt, and to the payment of the interest of the domestic debt; but so early as the 4th of August, 1790, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the Western territory were permanently and exclusively appropriated and pledged towards sinking and discharging the debts for which the United States were then holden. The annexed table, D, will exhibit a statement of the quantity of the public lands which have been annually sold, and of the proceeds of the sales, as far as can be now ascertained.

2. In the year 1792, however, commissioners were designated and authorized to purchase the public debt at its market price, not exceeding the par value, and the interest of the debt purchased, together with the surplus of certain other appropriations, was assigned for that purpose. When the annual amount of the fund thus created should be equal to two per cent. on the six per cent. stock, it was directed to be first applied to the redemption of that stock, according to the right reserved, and then to the purchase, at its market price, of any other public stock.

3. In the year 1795 "the Sinking Fund" was established by name; its resources were vested in the same commissioners, and its operations were subjected to their direction and management. The duty of the commissioners, independent of temporary objects, consisted in applying the Sinking Fund, 1st, to the payment of the six per cent. stock, at the stipulated rate of eight per cent. per annum; 2d, to the payment of the deferred stock after the year 1801, according to the same stipulation; and, 3d, if any surplus remained, towards the further and final redemption of the public debt, of every denomination. For the accomplishment of these purposes there were permanently appropriated and pledged, in addition to the other moneys constituting the Sinking Fund, and the interest of the amount of the purchased or redeemed debt, 1st, a sufficient sum arising yearly, and every year, from the duties on imports and tonnage, and the duty on domestic distilled spirits and stills, as might be rightfully paid of the principal of the six per cent. stock, commencing on the 1st of January, 1802. 2d. The dividends on the public shares in the Bank of the United States; but the shares were sold in 1796 and 1802, under an authority given in 1795. 3d. The net proceeds of the sales of public lands in the Western territory. 4th. Moneys received into the Treasury on account of old debts. 5th. The surpluses of revenue beyond the amount of the appropriations.

4. Such was the outline of the Sinking Fund, when, on the 6th of April, 1802, the internal duties were repealed; and, on the 29th of April, 1802, a new and additional provision was made for the redemption of the public debt. Thus, an annual sum of $7,300,000 was permanently appropriated and vested in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to be produced, 1st, by the moneys (other than the surpluses of revenue) which then constituted the fund, or should arise to it by virtue of any previous provisions. 2d. By the sums annually required to discharge the interest and charges of the public debt; and, 3dly. By so much of the duties on merchandise and tonnage as would be necessary, together with the preceding resources, to complete the annual investment of $7,300,000. The act not only placed the reimbursement of the principal, but also the payment on account of interest and charges of the public debt, under the superintendence of the commissioners; making it their duty to cause the fund to be applied in payment, 1st, of such sums as by virtue of any acts they had previously been directed to pay; 2d, of such sums as may be annually wanted to discharge the interest and charges accruing on any other part of the then debt of the United States; 3d, of such sums as may be annually required to discharge any instalment of the principal of the then debt; and 4th, as to any surplus, to apply it towards the further and final redemption, by payment or purchase of the then debt. The act of the 10th of November, 1803, having created six per cent. stock to the amount of $11,250,000, in pursuance of the convention for the purchase of Louisiana, added an annual sum of $700,000 to the Sinking Fund, to be paid out of the duties on merchandise and tonnage, and to be applied by the commissioners to the payment of the public debt, including the Louisiana stock, in the manner above stated. It may be added, that the interest on the Louisiana stock is payable in Europe; but the principal is reimbursable at the Treasury of the United States, in four annual instalments, commencing in 1818.

It is obvious that a sinking fund of $8,000,000 (independent of the general pledges in prior laws) was ample for the payment of the interest and the principal of the public debt, amounting only to the sum of $96,000,000, extinguishing the six per cent. stock in 1818, the deferred stock in 1824, and the Louisiana stock in 1822, as fast as the terms of the contracts and the policy of Government would permit. The general operation of the fund, indeed, has been shown; but it is proper more particularly to add, that, on the 1st of January, 1815, there had been transferred to the credit of the commissioners, in the books of the Treasury, an amount of public debt equal to the sum of $33,873,463 98, of the following denominations, to wit:

1.—Foreign Debt.

Three per cent. stock,	$8,200,000 00
Four and a half per cent. stock	-	820,000 00
Four per cent. stock	-	3,180,000 00
		$12,200,000 00

2.—Domestic Debt.

Six per cent. stock	-	1,946,026 92
Three per cent. stock	-	698,555 41
Deferred six per cent. stock	-	1,005,179 83
Eight per cent. stock	-	6,482,500 00
Exchanged six per cent. stock	-	6,294,051 12
Commuted six per cent. stock	-	1,859,850 70
Four and a half per cent. stock	-	176,000 00
Five and a half per cent. stock	-	1,848,900 00
Navy six per cent. stock	-	711,700 00
Louisiana six per cent. stock	-	326,500 00
Six per cent. stock of 1812	-	324,200 00
		$33,873,463 98

But the charges upon the Sinking Fund have accumulated, in consequence of the late war, to an amount which it has not the capacity to defray; while its operations, in other respects, have been obstructed by the temporary failure of the revenue arising from duties on merchandise and tonnage, and the protracted embarrassments of the circulating medium: thus,

1. The annual appropriation for the Sinking Fund amounts to $8,000,000, and consists at present—

From this view of the financial operations of the Government the Secretary of the Treasury, with every sentiment of deference and respect, presents the following general conclusions for the consideration of Congress:

1. That the existing revenue of the United States arises, 1st, from duties on imported merchandise, and the tonnage of vessels; 2d, internal duties, including the direct tax upon lands, houses, and slaves; and, 3d, the proceeds of the sales of public lands; but some of these duties and taxes are permanently imposed, and some are limited in their duration.

2. That the following duties or taxes are either partially or wholly limited in their duration: 1. The duties on merchandise and tonnage will be reduced one-half on the 17th of February, 1816, except such as are imposed on goods of the like description with the articles of domestic manufacture, on which duties have been laid, and included in the general pledge. 2. The new duty on salt; the duty on sugar refined within the United States; and the stamp duty on bank notes, promissory notes discounted, and on bills of exchange, are not included in the general pledge, and will wholly cease on the 17th of February, 1816.

3. That the following duties or taxes are not limited in their duration, and are included in the general pledge: 1. The direct tax upon lands, houses, and slaves. 2. The duties upon licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors and upon the liquors distilled. 3. The duty upon licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise. 4. The duty upon sales at auction. 5. The duty upon carriages and harness. 6. The duties upon household furniture and watches. 7. The duties on articles manufactured or made for sale within the United States. 8. The rate of postage.

4. That the faith of the United States, and the revenue arising from the duties and taxes, which are not limited in their duration, are pledged for the punctual payment of the public debt, principal and interest, according to the terms of the contracts respectively; and, for creating an adequate sinking fund, gradually to reduce, and eventually to extinguish the debt. But this pledge will be satisfied by the substitution of other adequate duties or taxes; and the increase in the proceeds of the duties on merchandise, subsequent to the pledge, affords an advantageous opportunity of making such substitution in respect to the more inconvenient and burdensome portion of the internal duties.

5. That the establishment of a revenue system, which shall not be exclusively dependent upon the supplies of foreign commerce, appears, at this juncture, to claim particular attention.

II.—A view of the finances for 1815, with estimates of the public revenue and expenses for 1816.

At the close of the last session of Congress the demands upon the Treasury were interesting in their nature, as well as great in their amount. Exclusively of the ordinary expenses of the Government, they consisted of demands for the payment of the army, preparatory to its reduction to the Peace Establishment, with other very heavy arrearages and disbursements in the War and Navy Departments; for the payment of the dividends on the funded debt, and of the arrearages, as well as the accruing claims on account of the Treasury note debt; and for the payment of the Louisiana dividends, with other considerable debts contracted in Europe in consequence of the late war.

The efficiency of the means which were possessed for the liquidation of these demands depended upon circumstances beyond the control of the Government. The balance of money in the Treasury consisted of bank credits, lying chiefly in the southern and western sections of the Union. The revenue proceeding from the provision made prior to the last session of Congress was, comparatively, of small amount. The revenue proceeding from the provision made during that session could not be available for a great portion of the present year; and, in both instances, the revenue was payable in Treasury notes, or it assumed the form of bank credits, at the respective places of collection. The only remaining resources for immediate use were an additional issue of Treasury notes, and a loan; but the successful employment of these resources was rendered for some time doubtful, by the peculiar situation of the credit and currency of the nation.

The suspension of specie payments throughout the greater portion of the United States, and the consequent cessation of the interchange of bank notes and bank credits, between the institutions of the different States, had deprived the Treasury of all the facilities of transferring its funds from place to place; and a proposition which was made, at an early period, to the principal banks of the commercial cities, on the line of the Atlantic, with a view, in some degree, to restore those facilities, could not be effected, for the want of a concurrence in the requisite number of banks. Hence it has happened (and the duration of the evil is without any positive limitation) that, however adequate the public revenue may be, in its general product, to discharge the public engagements, it becomes totally inadequate in the process of its application, since the possession of public funds in one part no longer affords the evidence of a fiscal capacity to discharge a public debt in any other part of the Union.

From the suspension of specie payments, and from various other causes, real or imaginary, differences in the rate of exchange arose between the several States, and even between the several districts in the same State; and the embarrassments of the Treasury were more and more increased, since Congress had not sanctioned any allowance on account of the rate of exchange; and the amount of the legislative appropriations was the same, wherever the legislative objects were to be effected. But the Treasury notes partook of the inequalities of the exchange in the transactions of individuals, although the Treasury could only issue them at their par value. The public stock, created in consideration of a loan, also partook of the inequalities of the exchange, although to the Government the value of the stock created, and the obligation of the debt to be discharged, were the same, wherever the subscription to the loan might be made.

Thus, notwithstanding the ample revenue provided and permanently pledged for the payment of the public creditor, and, notwithstanding the auspicious influence of peace upon the resources of the nation, the market price of the Treasury notes, and of the public stock, was everywhere far below its par or true value, for a considerable period after the adjournment of Congress; vibrating, however, with a change of place, from the rate of 75 to the rate of 90 per cent. Payments in bank paper were universally preferred, during that period, to payments in the paper of the Government; and it was a natural consequence that wherever the Treasury failed in procuring a local currency, it failed also in making a stipulated payment.

Under these extraordinary and perplexing circumstances, the great effort of the Treasury was, 1st. To provide promptly and effectually for all urgent demands, at the proper place of payment, and to the requisite amount of funds. 2d. To overcome the difficulties of the circulating medium, as far as it was practicable, so that no creditor should receive more, and no debtor pay less, in effective value, on the same account, than every other creditor, or every other debtor. And, 3d. To avoid any unreasonable sacrifice of the public property, particularly when it must also be attended with a sacrifice of the public credit. It was not expected that this effort would everywhere produce the same satisfaction, and the same results; but the belief is entertained that it has been successful in the attainment of its objects, to the extent of a just anticipation.

Of the uses of the Treasury Notes.

The Treasury notes, which were issued under acts passed prior to the 24th of February, 1815, were, for the most part a denomination too high to serve as a current medium of exchange, and it was soon ascertained that the small Treasury notes, fundable at an interest of 7 per cent., though of a convenient denomination for common use, would be converted into stock almost as soon as they were issued. With respect to the first description, therefore, the issue has not been restrained; but with respect to the second description, the issue has been generally limited to cases of peculiar urgency; such as the payment of the army, preparatory to its reduction; the payment of the dividends on the public debt where the local currency could not be obtained; and the payment of an inconsiderable amount of miscellaneous claims, apparently entitled to distinction.

The annexed table, marked E, contains a statement of the amount of the small Treasury notes which had been issued on the 30th of September, 1815, from which it appears,

1. That there had been issued, for the payment of the army, the sum of - - - - $1,465,069
2. That there had been issued, for the payment of the dividends of the public debt, the sum of - - - - 1,203,100
3. That there had been issued, for sundry miscellaneous claims, the sum of - - 109,681
4. That there has been sold at an advance (producing $32,107 64,) for the purpose of raising funds to meet the general engagements of the Treasury, a sum of - 1,365,000

$4,142,850

Of the Loan

The act of the 3d March, 1815, authorized a loan for a sum not exceeding $18,452,800. It was made lawful to accept, in payment of subscriptions, such Treasury notes as had been charged on the Sinking Fund; and a commission, not exceeding one quarter of one per cent., was allowed for selling the certificates of stock, or procuring subscriptions to the loan. Under this authority the annexed notice, marked F., dated the 10th of March, 1815, was published, opening a loan for the sum of $12,000,000, with a view, 1st, to absorb a portion of the Treasury note debt; 2d, to obtain funds for paying the unsubscribed arrearages of that debt; and, the 3d, to aid the Treasury with a supply of the local currencies of different places, in some proportion to the probable amount of the local demands.

The offers to subscribe to the loan prior to the 19th of April, 1815, placed (as it were proper to place) money and Treasury notes upon the same footing; but the offers varied essentially in the terms and conditions that were annexed to them; and, in point of fact, no direct offer was made to subscribe at a higher rate than 89 per cent., while some of the offers were made at a rate even lower than 75 per cent. Upon this experiment, therefore, it was seen at once that the new situation of the Treasury required a new course of proceeding, and that neither the justice due to the equal rights of the public creditor, nor a fair estimate of the value of the public property, nor an honorable regard for the public credit, would permit the loan to assume the shape and character of a scramble, subservient to the speculations, which create what is called a market price, and shifting in every town and village of every State, according to the arbitrary variations of what is called the difference of exchange.

In this view of the subject all the offers of subscriptions to the loan, made in the first instance, were declined; but it was declared, at the same time, that offers at the rate of 95 per cent. would be accepted. The rate thus proposed was adopted upon a consideration of the value of the stock, of the equitable as well as legal claim of the holders of Treasury notes, and of the real condition of the public credit. The object of the loan being (as already stated) to absorb a portion of the Treasury note debt, and to acquire a sufficiency of local currency for local purposes, the price of the stock at the Treasury was, of course, independent of the daily up and down prices of the various stock markets in the Union, and could only be effected by the progress towards the attainment of those objects. Thus, while the wants of the Treasury were sufficiently supplied, offers to subscribe were freely accepted, and the parties were sometimes authorized and invited to increase the amount of their offers; but, where local funds had so accumulated as to approach the probable amount of the local demands, the price of the stock was raised at the Treasury; and when the accumulation was deemed adequate to the whole amount of the local demands, the loan was closed.

The policy of the course pursued at the Treasury was soon demonstrated. Offers of subscription to the loan, at the rate of 95 per cent., payable in Treasury notes or in money, were presented to a large amount soon after the rule of the Treasury was declared; and the annexed table, marked G, will exhibit the progressive and actual state of all the subscriptions to the 30th of September last.

In the District of Columbia the money subscriptions (including the subscription of certain liquidated claims upon the Treasury) were, successively, at 95, 96½, 97, and 98 per cent., and finally at par. In the city of Baltimore the money subscriptions have been at 95 and 96½ per cent. In the city of Philadelphia the money subscriptions have been entirely at 95 per cent. The price was raised at the Treasury from 95 to 98 per cent. on the 18th of June, (subject, of course, to all unexecuted subscriptions previously accepted or authorized,) and since that time considerable offers have been received at 95 and 96 per cent., but none have been received at the increased rate of 98 per cent. The subscriptions, payable in Treasury notes, have been made in all places at the same rate of 95 per cent. A general abstract of the state of the loan may, therefore, be reduced to the following form:

In the District of Columbia the subscriptions have amounted—

1. In money, to the sum of	$2,282,037 38
2. In Treasury notes, to	257,276 65
	<hr/> 2,539,314 03

In Baltimore the subscriptions have amounted—

1. In money, to	$1,994,818 50
2. In Treasury notes, to	608,661 90
	<hr/> 2,603,480 40

In Philadelphia the subscriptions amounted—

1. In money, to	$1,845,000 00
2. In Treasury notes, to	1,260,568 69
	<hr/> 3,105,568 69

In New York the subscriptions have amounted—

1. In money, to	601 44
2. In Treasury notes, to	658,371 61
	<hr/> 658,973 05

In Rhode Island the subscriptions have amounted, in Treasury notes, to 132,020 69

In Massachusetts the subscriptions have amounted, in Treasury notes, to

97,301 32

In New Hampshire the subscriptions have amounted, in Treasury notes, to 52,386 20

In North Carolina the subscriptions have amounted, in Treasury notes, to

Having thus absorbed a portion of the Treasury note debt, and deeming the Treasury to be possessed of a sufficient supply of the local currency of the places at which the Treasury notes, unsubscribed and in arrears, were payable by law, except in the cities of New York and Boston, the Secretary of the Treasury proceeded to assign funds for the payment of the Treasury notes, and to give notice thereof in the form of the annexed copies, (marked, respectively, H and I,) in pursuance of the act of Congress, passed on the 3d of March, 1815. As a sufficient supply of the local currencies of Boston and New York had not been obtained, the overture was made in the same notice to discharge the Treasury notes payable in those cities, and in arrears, by accepting them in subscription to the loan, at the rate of 95 per cent., by exchanging them for other Treasury notes, in which the interest due should be included as principal, or by giving drafts for the amount upon any of the banks in which the Government possessed funds. This overture is still open to the consideration and acceptance of the holders of the Treasury notes in question, and has been accepted, in the shape of subscriptions to the loan, to a considerable extent. Since the 30th of September these amount, including some subscriptions, the details of which have not yet been contemplated, to more than $2,000,000.

Of the transfer of balances of appropriations and of revenue from 1814 to 1815.

In the administration of the finances it has been the practice to consider the demands and the supplies of each year as distinct subjects for legislative provision, independent of the balances of appropriations or of revenue existing at the close of the preceding years. The same course will now be pursued, but with a few explanatory remarks. The annual appropriations have never been entirely absorbed during the year for which they were made; and the credit given by law for payments in every branch of the revenue, necessarily introduces a discrimination between the amount of duties which accrues within the year, as a debt to the Government, and the amount which is paid within the year, as money into the Treasury. The annual appropriations, however, are not charged upon the revenue of the year specifically in which they are made; and, in point of fact, they are satisfied whenever demanded, out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury, without reference to the time when the revenue accrued, or when the money was actually received at the Treasury.

The inconvenience of continuing appropriations in force, which were liable to be drawn from the Treasury during any indefinite period, induced Congress to enact, in the year 1795, that any appropriations (except permanent appropriations for the interest of the funded debt, or appropriations for the payment of loans and the accruing interest, for the Sinking Fund, and for purposes which specially require, by law, a longer duration) remaining unexpended for more than two years after the expiration of the calendar year in which the act of appropriation was passed should cease and determine; and that the unexpended sum should be carried to an account on the books of the Treasury, to be denominated "the Surplus Fund." By the operation of this provision, no ordinary appropriation can now survive the specified period of two years; and, notwithstanding the formal designation of a particular account in which the entry shall be made, the sum disengaged by a determination of each appropriation, becomes again an undistinguishable part of the public treasure, which is subject to the future disposition of the Legislature.

With these remarks it will be useful, for the purpose of general information, to exhibit the gross amount of the balances of the appropriations for the year 1814, transferred to the year 1815, without entering into a comparative detail of the appropriations and of the revenues during the particular year in which the appropriations were made by law. Thus

The gross amount of the appropriations for 1814, including the aggregate of the balances of the appropriations for the year 1813, amounted to the sum of - - - - $55,978,464 20

Of this there was paid, on or before the 31st of December, 1814, the sum of - - - - $38,028,230 32

And, on the 1st of Jan. 1815, there was carried to surplus fund the sum of - - - - 592,309 99

Of the demands on the Treasury, for 1815.

The demands authorized by acts of appropriation during the year 1815, (exclusively of certain indefinite appropriations, the amount of which is not yet ascertained,) were the following:

For civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses, besides the unascertained product of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, assigned to defray the charges of courts, the sum of - - - - $3,080,656 22

For military expenses, including those of the Indian Department, and the permanent appropriation of $200,000 for arming and equipping the militia, the sum of - - - - 5,618,790 41

For naval expenses, including the annual appropriation of $200,000 for the purchase of timber - - - - 5,233,022 00

For the public debt, to wit:

The interest in the debt contracted before the war - - - - 1,900,000 00

The interest on the debt contracted since the war, (including the loan of 1815, and excluding the interest of Treasury notes) - - - - 3,560,000 00

The interest of 5 2-5 per cent. per ann., upon Treasury notes outstanding on the 1st of January, 1815, including notes due in 1814, and not paid, (the principal being then $10,646,480,) the sum of - - - - 575,000 00

The annual reimbursement of the principal of the old six per cent. and deferred stocks, the sum of - - - - 1,590,000 00

The principal of Treasury notes payable in 1814, and the 1st of January, 1815, but not then paid, the sum of - - - - 2,799,200 00

Of the Ways and Means of the Treasury for the year 1815.

These ways and means may be considered in a two-fold aspect: 1. As to the ways and means placed by the laws within the power of the Treasury; and, 2. The amount capable of being realized, or made actually available by the Treasury, during the year.

Under the first view the ways and means consisted—

1. Of the cash in the Treasury at the commencement of the year, which amounted to - - - - - $1,526,998 63

2. Of the outstanding revenue, which accrued prior to the year 1815, and remained unpaid at its commencement, estimated; exclusive of the sums due for public lands, at about - - 4,600,000 00

3. Of the revenue accruing in the year 1815, estimated at $38,850,000, viz:

Customs - - - - - $25,000,000
Direct tax, net product - 5,400,000
Internal duties, net product - - - - - 7,000,000
Public lands - - - - - 1,000,000
Postage and other incidental receipts - - - 450,000

38,850,000 00

4. Of the unexecuted authority to borrow money and issue Treasury notes, conferred by acts of Congress, passed prior to the year 1815, viz:

The loan act of March 14, 1812 - - - - - $765,300
The loan act of March 24, 1814 - - - - - 8,562,119
The loan act of November 15, 1814 - - - 3,000,000

12,327,419 00

Treasury note act of Mar. 4, 1814 - - - - - $2,772,720

Treasury note act of December 26, 1814 - - 8,600,000

11,372,720 00

5. Of the authority to borrow money and issue Treasury notes, conferred by acts of Congress, passed in the year 1815, viz:

The loan act of March 3, 1815 - - - - - $18,452,800

The loan act of Feb'y 13, 1815, (for public buildings in Washington) - 500,000

Treasury note act of Feb. 24, 1815, (exclusive of the re-issues authorized by this act) - - 25,000,000

Making together - - - - - $112,629,937 63

This great apparent surplus of ways and means within the power of the Treasury arose, in part, from the great increase in the amount of the customs accruing in the year 1815, which, instead of $4,000,000, the amount estimated prior to the peace, will probably in consequence of that event amount to the sum of $25,000,000, as here stated. A great portion also of the sums authorized to be borrowed, or raised upon Treasury notes, it was evident could not be obtained or raised within the year; and the several successive acts by which the authority was given, although they were nominally accumulative, were actually the results of attempts to vary or modify this authority in such a way as to render it more easy or more effectual in its execution.

The second view of the ways and means for the year 1815 exhibits the amount actually realized and received into the Treasury during the year. As the year is not yet terminated, this can only be given by way of estimate. The result will probably not differ materially from the following:

1. Cash in the Treasury at the commencement of the year - - - - - $1,526,998 63

2. Receipts from revenue, including that which was outstanding at the commencement of the year, viz:

Customs - - - - - $8,000,000
Direct tax - - - - - 2,200,000
Internal duties - - - 4,700,000
Public lands - - - - 1,000,000
Postage and other incidental receipts - - - 450,000

16,350,000 00

3. Receipts from loans and Treasury notes, viz: Loans—

Under the act of March 14, 1812 - - - - - $50,000 00

Under the act of November 15, 1814 - - - 950,000 00

Under the act of March 3, 1815 - - - - - 9,284,044 38

And will consist principally of Treasury notes, paid on account of the revenue and of loans.

Of the estimates of the Public Revenues and Expenditures for 1816.

In the consideration of this subject, it is proper to premise, that the revenue of 1816 must be charged with the payment of a considerable amount of the unliquidated debts incurred during the war; and, consequently, that the proportions of revenue and expenditure for that year cannot be reduced by the scale of a Peace Establishment.

The arrearages in the War and Navy Departments are, generally, the outstanding balance of the floating public debt, including Treasury notes and temporary loans, and must be satisfied before a permanent and uniform arrangement of the finances can be effected; but it is believed that the period of a single year will be sufficient for that purpose.

It is also proper to premise, that, although the estimates of the demands on the Treasury for 1816 may be satisfactorily made, there is no settled ground upon which estimates of the ways and means can be confidently formed. The entire system of external and internal taxation must necessarily be revised during the present session of Congress, and the sources as well as the product of the public revenue can only be ascertained from the result of the legislative deliberations.
In order however to obviate this difficulty, as far as it is practicable, distinct statements will be presented for 1816—1. Of the probable demands of the Treasury; 2. Of the revenue, estimated according to the laws now in force; and, 3. Of the revenue, estimated according to the modifications, which will be respectfully submitted.

1. Of the probable demands on the Treasury.

The amount of civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses, is estimated at the sum of - - - - $1,800,000

The amount of military expenses is estimated at the sum of - - - 14,549,246

For the Military Establishment of 1816 - - - $5,112,159

For the arrearages of 1815, appropriations - - - 9,437,087

The amount of the naval expenses (supposing them to be reduced, on the Peace Establishment, to one-half the amount appropriated for 1815, and adding the annual appropriation of $200,000 for the purchase of timber) is estimated at the sum of - - - 2,716,510

The amount of the payments required on account of the public debt is estimated at the sum of - - - 23,818,513

For the interest and annual reimbursement of the principal of the funded debt debt created since the war,

Making together - $23,818,513

From this aggregate of the demands for 1816, the charges of a temporary nature being deducted, to wit: deduct the amount of the arrearages for the military services of 1815 - $9,437,087

And the amount of the floating debt to be liquidated in 1816 - 16,158,513
 25,595,600

There will remain as the probable annual expenditure of the Peace Establishment, independent of any addition to the Sinking Fund, the sum of - $17,288,669

2. Of the revenue for 1816, estimated according to the laws now in force.

By the laws now in force the revenue arising from customs, during the year 1816, will be affected in the following manner: The present rates of duties continue until the 18th of February, 1816, when the duty on salt imported will cease, and the rates of duties on merchandise of every description, imported in American vessels, will fall to one-half of the existing amount, with the exception of certain manufactured articles, being of the same kinds as the manufactured articles on which internal duties have been imposed; the duties on the imported articles continuing at the existing rates, so long as the existing internal duties shall be continued upon the corresponding articles of domestic manufacture. On the 18th of February the extra duties on merchandise imported in foreign vessels, which is now 15½ per cent. on the amount of the duty in American vessels, will fall to 10 per cent. on that amount, and the tonnage duty on foreign vessels, which is now $2 per ton, will fall to fifty cents per ton. The extra duty is, also, liable to be affected by the operation of the act for abolishing all discriminating duties upon a basis of natural reciprocity.

By the laws now in force the revenue arising from internal duties will be affected in the following manner: The duties on bank notes, on notes discounted by banks, and bills of exchange, (commonly called the stamp duties,) and the duty on refined sugar, will cease on the 18th of February, 1816. All the other internal duties, together with the direct tax, and the increased rates of postage, will continue.

Under these circumstances the revenue which will accrue to the United States, during the year 1816, is estimated as follows:

From customs	- - - - -	$13,000,000
internal duties	- - - - -	7,000,000
direct tax, (net produce to the Treasury)	- - - - -	5,600,000
sales of public lands	- - - - -	1,000,000
postage and incidental receipts	- - - - -	400,000
		$27,000,000

The sums actually receivable into the Treasury, during the year, are estimated as follows:

From customs	- - - - -	$20,000,000
internal duties	- - - - -	6,500,000
direct tax, including arrears of 1815	- - - - -	8,500,000
the sales of public lands	- - - - -	1,000,000
postage and incidental receipts	- - - - -	400,000
		$36,400,000

If to this be added the probable amount of money in the Treasury, at the commencement of the year 1816, which may be estimated, exclusive of Treasury notes paid in, previously to that time, on account of revenue and of loans, at the sum of - - - - - 3,000,000

The effective ways and means of 1816 will produce, in the whole, the sum of	39,400,000
But as the demands upon the Treasury, for the same year, will amount, as above stated, to - - - - -	42,884,269

There will be left a deficit, to be supplied by means other than the revenue, of the sum of - - - - - $3,484,269

3. Of the revenue for 1816, estimated according to the modifications which will be respectfully submitted.

From the review of the financial measures of the Government, in reference to the recent state of war, which constitutes the first part of the present report, it appears that the almost entire failure of the customs, or duties on importations, and the increasing necessities of the Treasury, rendered it necessary to seek for pecuniary supplies in a system of internal duties; but both in respect to the subjects of taxation, and to the amount of the several taxes, the return of peace has always been contemplated as a period for revision and relief. In the fulfilment of that policy, a reduction of the direct tax; a discontinuance of taxes which, upon trial, have proved unproductive as well as inconvenient; and, above all, the exoneration of domestic manufactures from every charge that can obstruct or retard their progress, seem to be the objects that particularly invite the legislative attention. There will still remain, however, a sufficient scope for the operation of a permanent system of internal duties upon those principles of national policy which have already been respectfully suggested.

As an equivalent for the diminution of the revenue, by the contemplated abolition or reduction of some of the duties and taxes, and in observance of the public faith which is pledged, in the case of such abolition or reduction, to provide and substitute other duties and taxes equally productive, it is intended respectfully to recommend a continuance of the duty on imported salt, and a competent addition to the permanent rates of the duties on merchandise imported. In the general tariff which has been directed by a resolution of the House of Representatives to be prepared, and which will be submitted to Congress as soon as the materials for forming it can be digested and arranged, the subject will be more distinctly, as well as more satisfactorily, presented; but, as it is not probable that this measure can be so matured as to go into operation on the 18th of February next, it becomes necessary to suggest the expediency of continuing the present rates of duties until the 30th of June, when the new rates, with all the necessary details to give effect to the system, may be introduced, and sufficient notice be given to the merchants, to regulate their commercial operations accordingly.

In relation, then, to the internal duties, it is intended respectfully to recommend that the duties imposed at the last session of Congress, on various articles manufactured within the United States, shall be abolished on the 18th day of April next, which will complete the year, commencing from the time the duties went into operation; that the duty imposed during the last session of Congress, on spirits distilled within the United States, shall be abolished on the 30th day of June next, but that, at the same time, there be added 100 per cent. on the rate of the duty which had been charged on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors in the year 1813; that the duty on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches, be abolished on the 31st day of March next; that the additional duty imposed during the last session of Congress, on licenses to retail wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, be abolished on the 31st day of December, 1816; and that the duties on refined sugar, and the stamp duties, be continued; and, finally, in relation to the direct tax, it is intended respectfully to recommend that, on the 31st day of March next, it be reduced to one-half of its present amount; that is, to the annual amount of $3,000,000.

The subtraction from the revenue by these changes and reductions in the direct tax, and the internal duties, is estimated at the annual sum of $7,000,000. But the substitutes for supplying the equivalent amount are estimated to produce, 1st, from the increase of the duty on licenses to distillers, and the continuance of the stamp duties, and duties on refined sugar, the annual sum of $1,500,000; 2d, from the continuance of the duty on imported salt, the annual sum of $500,000; and, 3d, from an increase upon the permanent rates of duties on the importation of foreign merchandise, the annual sum of $5,000,000.

The full effect of the alterations which have been stated will not be developed until some time after the year 1816; but if they be adopted, the state of the revenue for that year, in the two views of which it is susceptible—1st, of revenue accruing during the year, and, 2ndly, of money receivable into the Treasury during the year, may be estimated as follows:

1. The revenue which will accrue in 1816 may be estimated—
From customs - - - -	$17,000,000
From internal duties - - - -	4,500,000
From direct tax, (net product to the Treasury) - - - -	2,700,000
From sales of public lands - - - -	1,000,000
From postage and incidental receipts - - - -	400,000
	$25,600,000

2. The moneys which will be actually receivable into the Treasury, from revenue, in 1815, may be estimated—
From the customs - - - -	$21,000,000
From internal duties - - - -	5,000,000
From direct tax, including arrears of 1815 - - - -	6,000,000
From sales of public lands - - - -	1,000,000
From postage and incidental receipts - - - -	400,000
	$33,400,000

If to the sum thus estimated to be receivable into the Treasury, from the revenue, during the year 1816 - - - -

There be added the money which will probably be in the Treasury at the beginning of the year - - - -

The aggregate will be the sum of - - - -

And the demands being estimated, as above, at - - - -

There will be left a deficit of - - - -

It is here, however, to be recollected, that the estimate of the demands on the Treasury comprehends the gross amount of the arrearages of the War Department, and a provision for the whole of the floating public debt; and although, for the purposes of a legislative appropriation, the aggregate of the expenditures to be authorized for the year 1816 is necessarily made the basis of the official estimates, yet the uniform experience of the Treasury evinces that the demands for a considerable portion of the annual appropriation will not be made during the year.

It may also be observed, that to raise a revenue by the imposition, or even by the continuance, of taxes, adequate to the immediate discharge of every unliquidated demand upon the Treasury, at the close of an expensive war, seems hardly to be necessary under the present circumstances of the country. The product of the revenue arranged in the manner which has been stated, may be estimated, after the year 1816, at an annual amount, nearly four millions greater than the sum required for the interest on the public debt, and for the probable expenses of the Peace Establishment. If the public debt, therefore, were increased in the year 1816, by a sum equal to the whole amount of the deficit as above stated, an equivalent reduction would be effected in less than two years. The unexecuted authority to borrow money, and to issue Treasury notes, already provided by the acts of Congress, is sufficient to enable the Treasury to meet the deficit in either of these modes, and consequently no further legislative aid (except, perhaps, in the modification of the issues of Treasury notes) appears at this time to be required.

III.—Propositions for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit.

The propositions which are now to be respectfully submitted, relate: 1. To the revenue. 2. To the Sinking Fund. 3. To the national circulating medium.

1. Propositions relating to the revenue.

The changes contemplated in the revenue, on the estimates of a Peace Establishment, having been already stated, as the intended objects of recommendation, it is only now necessary to submit to the consideration of Congress the measures requiring their sanction for carrying the plan into effect.

First. It is respectfully proposed that the act of the 1st of July, 1812, imposing an additional duty of 100 per cent. upon the permanent duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, and the act of the 29th of July, 1813, imposing a duty upon imported salt, be continued in force until the 30th day of June, 1816.

Second. It is respectfully proposed that the act of the 24th of July, 1813, imposing a duty on sugar refined within the United States, and the act of the 2d of August, 1813, imposing a duty on bank notes, notes discounted, and bills of exchange, be continued by law, in force, without limitation, but with proper amendments to render the collection of the duties more equal and more certain; and that the act of the 15th of December, 1814, imposing duties on carriages and the harness therefor; and that so much of the act of the 23d of December, 1814, as relates to the duties on sales at auction, and to the increasing of the rates of postage, be allowed to remain in force.

Third. It is respectfully proposed that there be a reduction or modification in the following taxes and duties:

1. That the direct tax be reduced from six millions to three millions of dollars, for the year 1816, and for each succeeding year.

2. That the duties on distilled spirits be discontinued after the 30th day of June, 1816; and that the duty on licenses to distillers be raised on that day to double the amount fixed by the act of the 24th of July, 1813.

3. That the duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise, be reduced to the rates of the year 1813, with proper regard to the periods when licenses commence and expire.

Fourth. It is respectfully proposed that the act of the 18th of January, 1815, and the act of the 27th of February, 1815, imposing duties on various articles manufactured, or made for sale within the United States, and the act of the 18th of January, 1815, imposing duties on household furniture and watches, be absolutely and entirely repealed.

Fifth. It is respectfully proposed that the act of the 3d of March, 1815, further to provide for the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, and the act of the 3d of March, 1815, to fix the compensations, and increase the responsibility of the collectors of the direct tax and internal duties, and for other purposes connected with the collection thereof, so far as it relates to the compensation of the collectors of the direct tax and internal duties, be continued in force without limitation.

2. Proposition relating to the Sinking Fund.

The Sinking Fund, as it is at present constituted, amounts to the annual sum of - - $8,000,000

It is charged, in the first instance with the payment of the interest, and the annual reimbursement of the principal of the old funded debt, which will require for 1816, and each of the two ensuing years, the sum of - - - $3,460,000

And it is charged with the payment of the interest, and the eventual reimbursement of the principal of the new funded debt; the interest, computed on a capital of $70,000,000, will require for the year 1816, and each subsequent year, the sum of - - - 4,200,000

The total present charge on the Sinking Fund, on account of the funded debt, being the annual sum of - - - $7,660,000

In 1818 the fund will be released from the annual charge of $1,380,000, accruing upon the old six per cent. stock, as the stock will then be paid and extinguished; but in the same year it will be subjected to a charge of $3,000,000, for the first instalment of the principal of the Louisiana stock, which will then become payable. In each of the two succeeding years a similar sum will be payable; and, in the year 1821, such sum will be payable as may be necessary to complete the reimbursement of that stock, and which is estimated at $1,923,500.

The Sinking Fund is also, at present, charged with the payment of the principal and interest of the Treasury notes issued under the act of the 4th of March, 1814, and of prior acts, and of certain temporary loans obtained under the loan acts of 1812, and of subsequent years. The several acts charging these payments on the Sinking Fund have directed that such sums, in addition to the annual appropriation of $8,000,000, should be taken from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as should be necessary to meet and satisfy the demand. The temporary loans and Treasury notes will, therefore, be probably paid or absorbed in 1817; and it is deemed unnecessary, for the present purpose, to include them in the consideration of the form and extent which it is proposed to give to the Sinking Fund in that year.

In 1803, when the Sinking Fund was established on its present footing, the principal of the public debt was about $86,000,000. and the inter est annually payable upon it about $4,500,000. At that time there was assigned to the Sinking Fund, out of the public revenue, $8,000,000, of which about $3,500,000 were annually applicable to the reduction of the principal of $86,000,000.

At the commencement of the year 1817 it is estimated that the principal of the funded debt will amount to $110,000,000, requiring the sum of $6,150,000 for the payment of its annual interest. If a sum applicable to the reduction of the principal of the debt were now to be assigned, bearing the same proportion to that principal which the sum assigned in 1804 then bore to the principal, it would amount to about $4,350,000. When it is added, therefore, to the sum of $6,150,000, which is necessary for the payment of the interest, there would be required for the amount now to be set apart, to constitute the Sinking Fund, the sum of $10,500,000 per annum. It is proposed, however, to carry the amount only to the sum of $10,000,000, which will allow about $3,850,000 as applicable to the reduction of the principal of the debt; a sum sufficient, if strictly and regularly applied without interruption, upon a compound principle, to pay off the whole of the funded debt in a period less than eighteen years.

Upon these grounds, then, the Secretary of the Treasury respectfully submits the following proposition:

That, in the year 1817, and annually in every subsequent year, there be appropriated the sum of $2,000,000, in addition to the sum of $8,000,000 now annually appropriated for the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt; that the payment of this additional sum be made out of the proceeds of the revenue derived from the customs, the sales of the public lands, and the internal duties, or from either of them, available after the payment of the sums for which they are now respectively pledged or appropriated; and that the said additional sum of $2,000,000 annually be payable to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to be applied by them in the same manner as the moneys which they are now entitled by law to receive; that is to say, 1st, to the payment of the interest on the public funded debt; 2ndly, to the reimbursement of the principal, from time to time, as the same, or any portion of it, shall become reimbursable, according to the terms of the contracts by which it has been created; and, 3dly, after having answered these purposes, if there shall remain a surplus at their disposal, to the purchase of such parts of the public funded debt as shall appear to them to be most for the advantage of the United States, in the manner prescribed by law, and at a rate not exceeding the par value.

3. Proposition relating to the National circulating medium.

The delicacy of this subject is only equalled by its importance. In presenting it, therefore, to the consideration of Congress, there is occasion for an implicit reliance upon the legislative indulgence.

By the Constitution of the United States, Congress is expressly vested with the power to coin money, to regulate the value of the domestic and foreign coins in circulation, and, as a necessary implication from positive provisions, to emit bills of credit; while it is declared by the same instrument, that "no State shall coin money, or emit bills of credit." Under this Constitutional authority the money of the United States has been established, by law, consisting of coins made with gold, silver, or copper. All foreign gold and silver coins, at specified rates, were placed, in the first instance, upon the same footing with the coins of the United States, but they ceased (with the exception of Spanish milled dollars, and parts of such dollars) to be a legal tender for the payment of debts and demands in the year 1809.

The Constitutional authority to emit bills of credit has also been exercised in a qualified and limited manner. During the existence of the Bank of the United States the bills or notes of the corporation were declared, by law, to be receivable in all payments to the United States; and the Treasury notes, which have been since issued for the services of the late war, have been endowed with the same quality. But Congress has never recognised, by law, the notes of any other corporation; nor has it ever authorized an issue of bills of credit to serve as a legal currency. The acceptance of the notes of banks, which are not established by the Federal authority, in payments to the United States, has been properly left to the vigilance and discretion of the Executive Department; while the circulation of the Treasury notes, employed either to borrow money, or to discharge debts, depends entirely (as it ought to depend) upon the option of the lenders and creditors to receive them.

The Constitutional and legal foundation of the monetary system of the United States is thus distinctly seen, and the power of the Federal Government to institute and regulate it, whether the circulating medium consist of coin or of bills of credit, must, in its general policy, as well as in the terms of its investment, be deemed an exclusive power. It is true, that a system depending upon the agency of the precious metals will be affected by the various circumstances which diminish their quantity, or deteriorate their quality. The coin of a State sometimes vanishes under the influence of political alarms; sometimes in consequence of the explosion of mercantile speculations, and sometimes by the drain of an unfavorable course of trade. But whenever the emergency occurs that demands a change of system, it seems necessarily to follow that the authority, which was alone competent to establish the national coin, is alone competent to create a national substitute. It has happened, however, that the coin of the United States has ceased to be the circulating medium of exchange, and that no substitute has hitherto been provided by the national authority. During the last year the principal banks, established south and west of New England, resolved that they would no longer issue coin in payment of their notes, or of the drafts of their customers, for money received upon deposit. In this act the Government of the United States had no participation, and yet the immediate effect of the act was to supersede the only legal currency of the nation. By this act, although no State can constitutionally emit bills of credit, corporations, erected by the several States, have been enabled to circulate a paper medium, subject to many of the practical inconveniences of the prohibited bills of credit.

It is not intended, upon this occasion, to condemn, generally, the suspension of specie payments; for appearances indicated an approaching crisis, which would, probably, have imposed it as a measure of necessity, if it had not been adopted as a measure of precaution. But the danger which originally induced, and perhaps justified, the conduct of the banks, has passed away, and the continuance of the suspension of specie payments must be ascribed to a new series of causes. The public credit and resources are no longer impaired by the doubts and agitations excited during the war by the practices of an enemy, or by the inroads of an illicit commerce; yet the resumption of specie payments is still prevented, either by the reduced state of the national stock of the precious metals, or by the apprehension of a further reduction to meet the balances of foreign trade, or by the redundant issues of bank paper. The probable direction and duration of these latter causes constitute, therefore, the existing subject for consideration. While they continue to operate, singly or combined, the authority of the States individually, or the agency of the State institutions, cannot afford a remedy commensurate with the evil; and a recurrence to the national authority is indispensable for the restoration of a national currency.

In the selection of the means for the accomplishment of this important object, it may be asked, 1st. Whether it be practicable to renew the circulation of the gold and silver coins? 2d. Whether the State banks can be successfully employed to furnish a uniform currency? 3dly. Whether a National Bank can be employed more advantageously than the State banks for the same purpose? And, 4thly. Whether the Government can itself supply and maintain a paper medium of exchange, of permanent and uniform value throughout the United States?

1. As the United States do not possess mines of gold or silver, the supply of those metals must, in a time of scarcity, be derived from foreign commerce. If the balance of foreign commerce be unfavorable, the supply will not be obtained incidentally, as in the case of the returns for a surplus of American exports, but must be the subject of a direct purchase. The purchase of bullion is, however, a common operation of commerce, and depends, like other operations, upon the inducements to import the article.

The inducements to import bullion arise, as in other cases, from its being cheap abroad, or from its being dear at home. Notwithstanding the commotions in South America, as well as in Europe, there is no reason to believe that the quantity of the precious metals is now (more than at any former period) insufficient for the demand throughout the commercial and civilized world. The price may be higher in some countries than in others; and it may be different in the same country, at different times; but, generally, the European stock of gold and silver has been abundant, even during the protracted war which has afflicted the nations of Europe.

The purchase of bullion in foreign markets upon reasonable terms is then deemed practicable, nor can its importation into the United States fail eventually to be profitable. The actual price of gold and silver in the American market would in itself afford for some time an ample premium, although the fall in the price must of course be proportionate to the increase of the quantity. But it is within the scope of a wise policy to create additional demands for coin, and in that way to multiply the inducements to import and retain the metals of which it is composed. For instance, the excessive issue of bank paper has usurped the place of the national money, and under such circumstances gold and silver will always continue to be treated as an article of merchandise; but it is hoped that the issue of bank paper will be soon reduced to its just share in the circulating medium of the country, and consequently that the coin of the United States will resume its legitimate capacity and character. Again, the Treasury, yielding from necessity to the general impulse, has hitherto consented to receive bank paper in the payment of duties and taxes; but the period approaches when it will probably become a duty to exact the payment either in Treasury notes, or in gold and silver coin—the lawful money of the United States. Again, the institutions which shall be deemed proper, in order to remove existing inconveniences, and to restore the national currency, may be so organized as to engage the interest and enterprise of individuals in providing the means to establish them. And, finally, such regulations may be imposed upon the exportation of gold and silver as will serve in future to fix and retain the quantity required for domestic uses.

But it is further believed that the national stock of the precious metals is not so reduced as to render the operation of reinstating their agency in the national currency either difficult or protracted. The quantity actually possessed by the country is considerable; and the resuscitation of the public confidence in bank paper, or in other substitutes for coin, seems alone to be wanting to render it equal to the accustomed contribution for a circulating medium. In other countries, as well as in the United States, the effect of an excessive issue of paper money, to banish the precious metals, has been seen; and, under circumstances much more disadvantageous than the present, the effect of public confidence in national institutions, to call the precious metals to their uses in exchange, has also been experienced.

Even, however, if it were practicable, it has sometimes been questioned whether it would be politic again to employ gold and silver for the purposes of a national currency. It was long and universally supposed that, to maintain a paper medium without depreciation, the certainty of being able to convert it into coin was indispensable; nor can the experiment which has given rise to a contrary doctrine be deemed complete or conclusive. But, whatever may be the issue of that experiment elsewhere, a difference in the structure of the Government, in the physical as well as the political situation of the country, and in the various departments of industry, seem to deprive it of any important influence, as a precedent for the imitation of the United States.

In offering these general remarks to the consideration of Congress it is not intended to convey an opinion that the circulation of the gold and silver coins can at once be renewed. Upon motives of public convenience the gradual attainment of that object is alone contemplated; but a strong, though respectful, solicitude is felt that the measures adopted by the Legislature should invariably tend to its attainment.

2d. Of the services rendered to the Government by some of the State banks during the late war, and of the liberality by which some of them are actuated in their intercourse with the Treasury, justice requires an explicit acknowledgment. It is a fact, however, incontestably proved, that those institutions cannot, at this time, be successfully employed to furnish a uniform national currency. The failure of one attempt to associate them with that view has already been stated. Another attempt, by their agency in circulating Treasury notes, to overcome the inequalities of the exchange, has only been partially successful. And a plan recently proposed, with the design to curtail the issues of bank notes, to fix the public confidence in the administration of the affairs of the banks, and to give to each bank a legitimate share in the circulation, is not likely to receive the general sanction of the banks. The truth is, that the charter restrictions of some of the banks, the mutual relation and dependence of the banks of the same State, and even of the banks of different States, and the duty which the directors of each bank conceive they owe to their immediate constituents, upon points of security or emolument, interpose an insuperable obstacle to any voluntary arrangement, upon national considerations alone, for the establishment of a national medium through the agency of the State banks. It is, nevertheless, with the State banks that the measures for restoring the national currency of gold and silver must originate; for, until their issues of paper be reduced, their specie capitals be reinstated, and their specie operations be commenced, there will be neither room, nor employment, nor safety, for the introduction of the precious metals. The policy and the interest of the State banks must, therefore, be engaged in the great fiscal work, by all the means which the Treasury can employ, or the legislative wisdom shall provide.

3d. The establishment of a National Bank is regarded as the best, and, perhaps, the only adequate resource to relieve the country and the Government from the present embarrassments. Authorized to issue notes, which will be received in all payments to the United States, the circulation of its issues will be co-extensive with the Union, and there will exist a constant demand, bearing a just proportion to the annual amount of the duties and taxes to be collected, independent of the general circulation for commercial and social purposes. A National Bank will, therefore, possess the means and the opportunity of supplying a circulating medium of equal use and value in every State, and in every district of every State. Established by the authority of the Government of the United States, accredited by the Government to the whole amount of its notes in circulation, and intrusted as the depository of the Government with all the accumulations of the public treasure, the National Bank, independent of its immediate capital, will enjoy every recommendation which can merit and secure the confidence of the public. Organized upon principles of responsibility, but of independence, the National Bank will be retained within its legitimate sphere of action, without just apprehension from the misconduct of its directors, or from the encroachments of the Government. Eminent in its resources, and in its example, the National Bank will conciliate, aid, and lead, the State banks in all that is necessary for the restoration of credit, public and private. And acting upon a compound capital, partly of stock, and partly of gold and silver, the National Bank will be the ready instrument to enhance the value of the public securities, and to restore the currency of the national coin.

4th. The power of the Government to supply and maintain a paper medium of exchange will not be questioned; but, for the introduction of that medium, there must be an adequate motive. The sole motive for issuing Treasury notes has, hitherto, been to raise money in anticipation of the revenue. The revenue, however, will probably become, in the course of the year 1816, and continue afterwards, sufficient to discharge all the debts, and to defray all the expenses of the Government; and, consequently, there will exist no motive to issue the paper of the Government as an instrument of credit.

It will not be deemed an adequate object for an issue of the paper of the Government, merely that it may be exchanged for the paper of the banks, since the Treasury will be abundantly supplied with bank paper by the collection of the revenue; and the Government cannot be expected to render itself a general debtor, in order to become the special creditor of the State banks.

The co-operation of the Government with the National Bank, in the introduction of a national currency, may, however, be advantageously employed by issues of Treasury notes, so long as they shall be required for the public service.

Upon the whole, the state of the national currency, and other important considerations connected with the operations of the Treasury, render it a duty respectfully to propose—

That a National Bank be established at the city of Philadelphia, having power to erect branches elsewhere; and that the capital of the bank (being of a competent amount) consist of three-fourths of the public stock, and one-fourth of gold and silver.

All which is respectfully submitted.

A. J. DALLAS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

PROHIBITION OF THE IMPORTATION OF COARSE COTTON FABRICS.

[Communicated to the Senate, December 13, 1815.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled :

The petition of the undersigned citizens of the United States, concerned in the manufacturing of cotton fabrics, in behalf of themselves and others interested in similar establishments, respectfully sheweth: That, during the late season of domestic pressure, arising in a measure from the interruption of the foreign commerce of the country, your petitioners, together with numerous others, citizens of the United States, undertook, and after a considerable expenditure of money and of labor, have at length partially succeeded in the erecting and putting into operation extensive works employed in the manufacturing of cotton goods. That large sums of money have been expended by your petitioners and others upon these objects. That, by means of these exertions, and of the commodities furnished from these sources, the pressure of the late war upon the great body of the community was considerably alleviated. That, from the difficulties inseparable from the establishment of new branches of manufacture; the scarcity of persons properly qualified to superintend their operation; the enormous compensation demanded by those whose skill and experience were requisite, and the high price of labor throughout the country, your petitioners have not as yet been remunerated for the heavy expenses which they have incurred, while the prospect which is just opening of a free and unrestricted importation of the same articles of foreign manufacture, threaten to deprive them of every expectation of a reasonable profit, and, at one blow, to crush the establishments themselves, and to sink the capital which has been invested in them.

Your petitioners, under these circumstances of impending ruin, respectfully entreat the interposition of your honorable bodies, to preserve them and the country from these disastrous and fatal results; and more particularly is it the wish of your petitioners to suggest the propriety and expediency of effecting this desirable object by imposing an absolute or virtual prohibition upon the importation of foreign cotton fabrics of a coarse texture.

Your petitioners will not at this moment venture to encroach upon the time of your honorable bodies by entering into a minute and elaborate argument to substantiate their claims to the attention of Government, or to prove the proposed measure reconcilable with the permanent and solid interests of the community at large; but they beg leave, respectfully, to submit a few prominent facts and leading arguments bearing upon the question:

The establishments for the manufacturing of various articles of cotton, which have already been erected in the United States, are at this moment extensive, and capable of affording a supply nearly or quite commensurate with the demand for domestic consumption.

They have afforded the means of employment to thousands of poor women and children, for whom the ordinary business of agriculture supplies no opportunities for earning a livelihood, educating them in habits of honest industry, and giving additional encouragement to labor and to population.

They have also supplied at moderate prices the necessary demands of the country and the Government, during the recent interruption of our foreign trade.

They have assisted the Southern agriculturist by the consumption of some portion of that superfluous produce which was deprived of its ordinary vent in the demands of foreign nations.

The articles which your petitioners humbly suggest may be subjected to large additional duties, or an absolute prohibition, are chiefly the production of countries lying beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

They are manufactured in a large proportion of cotton of foreign growth, and thus interfere with and discourage a primary object of our own agriculture.

They are not paid for with articles of domestic production, but occasion a continual and wasteful drain of specie of the country.

They are made of a very inferior material, and are manufactured in a manner which make them a mere deception on the consumer. Nearly all Europe have legislated against them; several of which nations have not a single spindle in their dominions, but on the grounds of their little real usefulness, and as sapping the industry of the country; and by thus prohibiting or restricting their introduction, urge the people to seek a better substitute.

They pay an ad valorem duty, and add but a small amount to the resources of the Treasury.

They afford employment to but a few tons of our shipping, and will, in all probability, be hereafter introduced in the ships, or through the medium of a rival nation.*

* June 24, 1815, arrived at New York the English ship Princess Charlotte, Turnbull, from Calcutta, Madras, the Cape of Good Hope, and fifty-five days from St. Helena, with nine hundred bags of sugar, indigo, spices, saltpetre, pepper, and nearly six hundred tons of piece goods, (selected for this market.)

Prohibition of the Importation of Coarse Cotton Fabrics.

It is by admitting those goods that England will not herself admit for home consumption, that we encourage her to make conquests in India, by thus making them valuable to her.

Their free introduction will prove the necessary ruin of our own establishments, and the total loss of the immense capital now invested in them.

Your petitioners are aware that the measures which they have respectfully suggested may seem to militate against one of the fundamental principles of political economy, as laid down by the ablest writers on the subject, viz: that trade should, as far as practicable, be left free and unrestrained; and that heavy imposts or prohibitions upon foreign commodities, with a view of encouraging their domestic production, are usually inimical to the general interests of the community, and productive of injurious results. Your petitioners, without impugning the soundness of this doctrine in theory, would respectfully suggest that it is an abstract speculation, requiring, when reduced to practice, numerous and important exceptions from its literal import, and always dependent upon two bases essential to its accuracy, and which, from the operation of human passions, can rarely be calculated upon. First, that the rule is universally adopted and acted upon as a principle of policy, regulating the practice of all those foreign nations with whom we have commercial dealings. Secondly, that the freedom of commerce shall never be interrupted by a recurrence to hostilities, or embarrassed by the watchful jealousy of foreign rivals. Unless these circumstances fortunately concur, it will not unfrequently happen that the strict adherence to the letter of the rule will operate as a manifest violation of the principle upon which it is founded, and which it is designed to express.

When the jealousy, the policy, or the ignorance, of other nations have occasioned the adoption of special exceptions among themselves, the equal regard to every branch of industry which it was the intention of the doctrine to preserve unimpaired, as well as a wise regard to our own interests, will frequently require that these partial and injurious aberrations should be met and counteracted by corresponding deviations on our part from its original strictness. If, in order to obtain or preserve a permanent monopoly of certain branches of trade, one nation vexes and harasses every rival that can interfere with this favorite object of policy, the ordinary dictates of prudence would require that these attempts should be resisted, and their injurious consequences to ourselves be averted. It is an undisputed fact, that every nation with whom the United States have or can expect to have commercial intercourse have studiously sought by artificial means to secure some peculiar advantage, or to guard against some apprehended evil, by occasionally favoring certain branches of commerce and certain articles of manufacture. Recently there has appeared no disposition among them to adopt more liberal principles of policy. The Prince of Orange, the intimate ally of England, without a spindle in his dominions, has, since the peace in Europe, prohibited the importation of cotton twist and the coarser cotton goods; all cotton goods that shall not have cost thirty cents per square yard, and all cotton colored goods that shall not have cost thirty-six cents per square yard. France has, more than six years since, prohibited all cotton yarn and all cotton goods from beyond the Cape of Good Hope. England does not admit an article for home use that has the appearance of being manufactured, but gives a bounty to the exporter of her own manufactured cottons. Whether their example may be adduced as a proof that the results of experience sometimes militate against the deductions of speculative theory, or whether the United States are not required, by a wise attention to their own interests, to provide against the inconveniences to which they have thus been subjected by the policy of other nations, your petitioners would humbly submit to the consideration of your honorable bodies.

Six hundred tons, at the large allowance of four ounces to the yard, will make about five million of yards; at an average sale of twenty-five cents per yard, is $1,200,000; thus one single ship, and she a foreign ship, draws from the stock of industry of the United States $1,200,000 that might have remained with the common stock of industry of the country, and literally put out at compound interest for the benefit of the country generally: whereas it will now be drawn from us never again to appear, and our own poor women and children, not capable otherwise of earning their living, thrown back upon the community for support.

The frequent interruptions to which even the freest commerce is exposed opens a still more fruitful source of argument in favor of your petitioners. While nations are subjected to have their foreign trade embarrassed or impeded in its operations by the hostile aggressions of those over whose measures they have no control, it would deserve another name than philosophical wisdom to permit an adherence to a technical rule of theoretical politics to interfere with, or prevent a watchful attention to their own vital interests. The evident tendency of an unrestrained trade is to create a mutual and equal dependency among nations, and to preserve among them the relations of peace by withdrawing from all every inducement to war. So far as one country receives the superfluous productions which minister to its artificial wants or luxurious habits from another, this effect will be produced, and the dependence that is created must be reciprocal. But when we rely upon a foreign market for commodities of universal and necessary consumption, we receive only the superfluous productions which they can spare, and subject ourselves to an absolute dependence upon their caprices or passions, in which we may be compelled to submit to indignity and oppression, or to draw upon ourselves the most grievous sufferings, and, perhaps, utter ruin, by resisting their ungenerous and galling outrages. Every nation, therefore, whose government has been administered with sagacity and wisdom, and whose natural resources did not interpose insurmountable barriers to the attempt, has labored, unremittingly, to place those objects upon which they depended for subsistence or defence beyond the reach of accident or war, by encouraging their domestic production at every expense, and at every sacrifice.

Your petitioners would respectfully submit that the domestic manufacture of cotton goods comes within this last mentioned exception in two ways. The cultivation of this article, as a product of agriculture, is an object of primary importance to a large and wealthy section of the country; and the consumption of the coarser cotton fabrics extends so equally and universally, as to include every family within the territories of the United States. Unless the domestic manufacturing establishments can afford a partial vent for the productions of the Southern agriculturist, and afford an adequate supply for the extensive demands of a population of eight millions of people, any sudden interruption of our foreign commerce must be productive of the most disastrous consequences to all the growers and all the consumers of the article in question; and should this interruption prove permanent, or even be protracted to a period not exceeding the ordinary continuance of modern wars, may eventuate in the utter ruin of many, and the extreme distress of all. The growers of cotton must lose, or change their crops; the consumers must pay enormous prices for articles of daily and universal use, or have recourse to those wretched expedients, the use of which is ever generated by necessity.

Nor will these evils be prevented, or even in any considerable degree alleviated, by domestic establishments in a season of calamity, created for the emergency, and perishing with the circumstances, which gave them birth. Manufactories are erected at an enormous expense of capital; and time, industry, and experience are required for their effectual operation. The ephemeral attempts to which a severe pressure would give rise must be of uncertain duration; and monstrous as well as immediate profits will be wrung from the distress of others, to afford some remuneration for the risk that has been incurred. Articles of necessary consumption will be subjected to the most enormous variations in their price, and extravagant and casual profits will take the place of the moderate and reasonable returns of a safe and certain trade.

Your petitioners would respectfully submit that the injurious consequences which they have thus briefly sketched, can be effectually provided against, only by a liberal encouragement of the domestic manufactures, by an absolute or virtual prohibition, during a period of peace, of foreign commodities of the same description; and they would beg leave further to suggest that the present season affords a happy opportunity for the interposition of Congress to prevent these evils, and to protect those whose individual and unassisted exertions have hitherto tended to avert or alleviate them.

It cannot have escaped the attention of your honorable bodies that it would be the obvious interest of the European nations, and consistent with those maxims of policy by which their measures have ever been guided, and to which they are at this moment giving additional efficacy, to crush the infant, and as yet immature, establishments in this country, which threaten at no distant period of time to interfere with their own profits, and to place us above a dependence which it has ever been their anxious wish to extend and strengthen. By pouring in upon us, during the present year, a flood of goods, at reduced prices, this result would in all probability, be accomplished, and there is too much reason to apprehend that their respective Governments would shrink from no pecuniary assistance to further the mercenary views of individual cupidity. If these rivals be once crushed to the earth, even by a large temporary sacrifice, it will be in their power effectually to prevent their second growth, and thus to hold a complete control over our consumers and our planters, by regulating, according to their own discretion, the price of the raw production and the manufactured commodity in our markets, and thus to perpetuate a dependence which their monopolizing predilections are but too prone to abuse to our detriment.

Your petitioners would further respectfully submit to the consideration of your honorable bodies, that, at this period of general pacification throughout Europe, every nation will become the carrier of its own articles of production and consumption; that a large portion of our accustomed commerce must necessarily perish, and the means of discharging the enormous balance in favor of England will soon be exhausted by a total drain of our specie from the country, already at a premium of fifteen per cent. Under these circumstances the encouragement of the domestic manufactures of the coarser goods would tend much to prevent the embarrassments likely to ensue from this aspect of affairs, and to relieve the country from these threatening evils.

The manufacturing establishments in this country have now attained a degree of importance, and embrace so great a variety of interests, as to entitle them to some portion of the liberal patronage of Government. Commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, have become intimately connected, and, if duly and proportionably encouraged, will mutually assist and support each other. The natural advantages of the country have opened to its citizens a broad and even road to prosperity and greatness. To harmonize the various interests of the whole, and to complete the great circle of national grandeur, manufactories are essentially necessary. The advantageous sites for the erection of suitable works which every district supplies, render it emphatically an object of national importance; by the purity of manners, and the intelligence which eminently characterize our citizens; the wholesome jealousy with which all monopolizing institutions are regarded, and the salutary superintendence of a vigilant and impartial administration of the laws, promise to secure us for ages against those evils of which politicians and moralists have considered them to be productive.

Your petitioners would beg leave to call the attention of your honorable bodies to some of those interests which would be protected by the measure proposed, and to some of the consequences of which it would be productive.

The growers of cotton would be presented with a convenient market for a large portion of their produce, not subject to the fluctuations of political events, nor controlled by the cupidity of foreign traders, certain in its demand, and enlarging with the increasing consumption and abilities of the country.

The consumers would be assured of a never-failing supply of well-wrought fabrics, daily improving in quality and diminishing in price, and unaffected by the interference, the jealousy, or the hostility of foreign nations.

The country would preserve the whole amount of capital already invested in these establishments, be no longer subjected to the uncertainties of foreign trade for an important article of necessary consumption, enlarge and increase the objects of industry, affording new encouragements to her population and emigration to our country of foreign artists, and relieve herself from the pressure of a serious balance against her in her foreign trade.

To the Government would be secured the means of clothing its troops under every emergency, and a new, certain, productive, and increasing source of revenue during a season of war.

The internal and coasting trade, and the communication between the different and remote sections of the country would be substituted for an inconsiderable and injurious branch of foreign commerce, harmonizing their conflicting and jarring interests, and strengthening the bonds of mutual dependence.

These considerations your petitioners would beg leave to press upon the serious attention of your honorable bodies in support of the measure they have proposed, relying implicitly upon the patriotism and wisdom of Congress for the adoption of some means of relief and encouragement.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

[Communicated to the Senate, December 22, 1815.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The petition of the undersigned citizens of the United States, being a committee appointed by, and acting for and in behalf of the cotton manufacturers residing in Providence and its vicinity, respectfully sheweth: That, in consequence of the interruption of commerce, and relying on the favorable disposition uniformly manifested by the Government of the United States towards domestic manufactures, your petitioners have, at a great expense of money and labor, erected and put into operation extensive works for manufacturing cotton goods. Most of the establishments for this object have been completed within a few years, and, owing to the numerous and unavoidable difficulties always attendant on the introduction of new branches of business, and the embarrassments arising from the situation of the foreign relations of the country, the proprietors have, hitherto, been prevented from reaping the reasonable profits which they calculated to obtain. During the continuance of the late war, in addition to the ordinary expenses and difficulties of prosecuting the business, they had also to struggle against the enormous advances in the price of almost every article they used, together with the trouble, cost, and delay, which accrued from the necessity of transporting by land the raw material, and every other commodity required for the supply of the manufactories, and for the support and maintenance of the people employed therein. The same burdensome expense and disadvantage were also experienced in conveying the goods, when finished, to distant markets for sale. But while your petitioners have had to lament that the circumstances of the times did not permit them to realize the profits which they had a right to expect, they had the satisfaction to perceive that the nation was deriving great and important benefits from their labors, receiving, from the skill and industry of our own citizens, vast supplies of useful and necessary commodities, at moderate prices, calculated for universal consumption, and at a period when they could not be obtained from abroad; and that employment and the means of earning a comfortable livelihood were at the same time extended to thousands of poor people, dependent on their labor alone for support, and who must otherwise have been reduced to a state of misery and want.

The event has also fully proved, in the opinion of your petitioners, that, by due encouragement on the part of Government to domestic manufactures, there may be insured to the country, from this source alone, an abundant and regular supply of the most essential and important kinds of cotton goods, at fair prices, and independent of foreign nations.

Your petitioners would now respectfully represent that, in addition to the accumulated embarrassments and losses under which they have labored, the pressure of which has been so great, during the last year, as to induce many of the manufacturers to contract their business, and some to suspend it entirely, the free and unrestricted admission at present allowed into the United States, of cotton fabrics of foreign production, not only extinguishes the hope of a reasonable profit in future from the manufacture of similar goods at home, but threatens the speedy destruction of the establishments already erected for that purpose, and the loss of the immense capital invested in them. They, therefore, earnestly entreat the interposition of your honorable body, to preserve them from impending ruin. They are the more encouraged in this application, as they conceive the time propitious for Government to extend its fostering care to the manufactures of the country, and are convinced that the request accords with the general feelings and wishes of the people, and with the best interests of the nation.

As an eligible mode of effecting the object in view, your petitioners would respectfully submit to the consideration of Congress the expediency of prohibiting, by law, the importation of all cotton goods, (nankeens excepted,) the production of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and of augmenting the duty on those of a coarse texture imported from other parts of the world.

It is well known that the cotton fabrics of India are made from very inferior stock, and that they are so badly manufactured as to be of little intrinsic value, compared with the substantial and durable manufactures of our own country; and it is believed that almost every nation of Europe has found it expedient to discourage their use, by subjecting them to very heavy duties, or have prohibited their importation entirely; and it is deserving of particular observation that their consumption is interdicted in England, although they are the production of her own colonies. It is also a weighty consideration that, being made wholly of a material of foreign growth, so far as their introduction is permitted, they operate to deprive our own citizens, engaged in the cultivation of cotton, of their best and surest market, and thus injuriously affect one of our most important branches of agriculture.

In order to show the extent and importance of the cotton manufacture in the United States, your petitioners beg leave respectfully to state that it has been satisfactorily ascertained that in the small district alone comprised within a circle of thirty miles from Providence, there are not less than one hundred and forty manufactories, containing, in actual operation, more than 130,000 spindles, and capable of holding a much larger number, few of them having yet received their full complement of machinery. The quantity of cotton which, in their present state, they spin in a year, may be computed at 29,000 bales, which, when manufactured into cloth of the descriptions commonly made, will produce 27,840,000 yards, the weaving of which, at the average price of eight cents, amounts to $2,227,200, and the total value of the cloth will exceed $6,000,000. To complete the manufacture from the raw material, until the goods are fit for market, it is estimated would afford steady and constant employment to 26,000 persons. But the benefits resulting from this vast amount of labor are much more extensively diffused than if the whole were done by people constantly engaged in the business, a considerable portion of it being performed by those who are partially occupied in other pursuits, particularly the weaving, which is almost wholly executed at the farm-houses throughout the country, few of which are to be found not supplied with looms.

In this estimate are not intended to be included the numerous classes of persons engaged in occupations indirectly connected with and dependent upon the manufacture, such as those employed in furnishing the various kinds of machinery used in the works, in supplying the people with provisions and other necessities and conveniences, in transporting goods to and from the manufactories, together with those engaged in the coasting trade, in bringing the raw material and other commodities required for the use of the establishments, and in conveying the manufactures to market.

From this cursory view of the subject a faint representation is exhibited how intimately the cotton manufacture, although but in its infancy, is united and blended with almost every other occupation; thus creating an interest, in a greater or less degree, in all classes for its maintenance and success, and involving in its destruction very disastrous consequences to the whole body of the community.

Your petitioners know of no description of persons who are not, either directly or indirectly, benefited by this branch of manufacture, except a few capitalists engaged in the trade to India, a commerce affording employment for comparatively but few of our ships and mariners, far less, it is humbly conceived, than would be necessary to carry on the coasting trade arising from the manufacture at home of the same quantity of goods imported from thence. Nor does it afford a market for a single article of our own production, but operates as a continual and destructive drain of the specie of the country, the scarcity of which is at this moment most severely felt. It may be also worthy of remark that the augmentation of the revenue arising from the increased consumption of indigo and other articles used in dyeing, and the various commodities and materials required in the erection of the works, and in the different processes of the manufacture, many of which are subjected to heavy duties, would, it is humbly believed, nearly, if not entirely, remunerate the Treasury for the loss occasioned by the interdiction proposed.

Your petitioners are aware that it has been a favorite maxim with some, that commerce should be left free and unrestrained; and, while they are far from being disposed to controvert its correctness as a general rule, subject, like all others, according to circumstances, to particular exceptions and modifications, they beg leave respectfully to suggest that they believe it far safer, and more agreeable to the dictates of political wisdom, to follow in the beaten tract of successful experience, rather than to pursue a course of policy not sanctioned by the practice of any other commercial or manufacturing people, and resting solely on opinion and theory for its support. All those nations which have carried commerce and manufactures to the greatest extent, have judged it expedient to protect their citizens against foreign competition. No Government has been more vigilant and rigid in this particular than that of England—a policy which it has steadily pursued for ages, and which has been crowned with unexampled success. While the same principles continue to be persevered in by other nations, a contrary practice on the part of the United States would subject us to a species of colonial dependence, rendering us at once the victim of our own liberality and a prey to foreign cupidity and caprice.

Your petitioners would endeavor to avoid encroaching upon the time of your honorable body, by the repetition of arguments of a general nature, which have been often urged, and which must readily occur to every reflecting mind; but deeming the subject of primary importance in a national point of view, and deeply affecting their individual interests, they persuade themselves it will not be considered obtrusive, succinctly to enumerate some of the particular and immediate advantages, which they conceive the country would derive from the extension of the patronage of Government to the manufacture in question.

It would insure a constant and competent supply, at reasonable prices, of articles wanted for general and daily consumption, not liable to be interrupted by the hostility or injustice of foreign nations.

The internal and coasting trade, which has always been considered as the most advantageous to a nation, and worthy of a high degree of public encouragement, would be thereby promoted and extended; and, by the mutual interchange of commodities between the remote sections of our extensive country, would have a salutary and powerful tendency to bind and link together the various parts in the bonds of reciprocal dependence and friendship.

By a portion of our population being engaged in manufactures a market would be created at home for the productions of agriculture, not subject to be destroyed or materially injured by the enmity or jealousies of foreign Governments. This consideration is of the more importance in the present state of the world, when a general pacification has taken place between the nations of Europe, which promises to be of long duration, and forbids the expectation that the productions of the United States will continue to command such high prices abroad as during the last twenty years, while those nations were engaged in the most destructive and sanguinary wars.

A sure and regular demand would be produced for a considerable portion of the cotton raised in the United States, continually augmenting with the means of manufacturing it, and the increasing consumption of the goods.

It would enlarge the field of useful industry and enterprise, and, by multiplying the sources of wealth and the means of subsistence, would encourage population and the emigration to our country of foreign artists and others, bringing with them the latest improvements in manufactures and the mechanic arts. The vast capital already invested in these establishments would be preserved, and, by its active and successful employment, would continue to contribute largely to the riches and prosperity of the nation.

Your petitioners would further respectfully suggest that the cotton fabrics of India usually imported into the United States, being of a coarse texture and cheaply made, their prime cost is very inconsiderable, and paying only an ad valorem duty, they afford but a small income to the Treasury; and the loss incurred by their exclusion might, it is humbly conceived, in a great degree, if not wholly, be restored, by increasing the duty on the coarser kinds of cotton goods imported from other parts of the world.

They, therefore, pray your honorable body to take their case into your serious consideration, and that a law may be passed prohibiting the importation of all cotton goods, (nankeens excepted,) the production of places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and laying such duty on those of a coarse texture, imported from other countries, as shall give to your petitioners the necessary protection and relief, and as Congress in their wisdom may deem expedient.

And, as in duty bound, will ever pray,

PROTECTION TO THE SUGAR PLANTERS OF LOUISIANA.

[Communicated to the House, January 5, 1815.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the sugar planters, citizens of the State of Louisiana, respectfully represents:— That there is, perhaps, no culture more important and advantageous to the United States than that of the sugar cane, the produce of which, though at first ranked among the luxuries of life, has, from its universal use, become an article of the first necessity. Before the acquisition of Louisiana, vast sums of money were lost to the United States in the purchase of sugar, rum, and molasses, made in the East and West Indies, from whence alone those commodities were obtained. In time of war supplies from thence are precarious, and the consumer would be either entirely deprived of those necessary articles, or could obtain them only at extravagant rates. It is, then, obviously the interest of the United States to encourage the cultivation of the cane, and to secure to themselves the advantages which Louisiana offers in this particular. Whilst its citizens rejoice in the means which nature has placed within their reach, of supplying the wants of the other States of the Union, they have at the same time to lament that their ability to effect it will depend on the fostering aid of the General Government.

Beyond all others, the culture of the cane is attended with difficulties. It requires enormous capitals. The lands that produce it are dear, large gangs of slaves, and laboring animals are required, immense edifices are to be erected, mills, and expensive utensils are to be obtained; add to those the costly and unceasing labor that is required in forming, and keeping up the works that are necessary to prevent the overflowing of the mighty stream that borders those lands, the numerous canals for draining them, and without which they would not be susceptible of cultivation; so that after a fortune has been consumed, and often distressing debts incurred, years on years elapse before the most fortunate and successful reap the reward of their expenditures and toils. It is true, in a propitious season this culture affords greater profit than any other, but numerous and dreadful are the accidents that often blast the hopes of the planter. The climate is subject to hurricanes, the ravages of which not only destroys the crop in the ground, and often the expectation of the one ensuing it, but levels to the ground the buildings which had been erected at such an immense cost. Those are evils which sugar planters every where experience; but there are others, which are the peculiar scourge of those of Louisiana—an early frost prevents the maturity of the cane, and greatly injures its yield; a warm day, in the season of making sugar, occasioning it to ferment, sours the juice, and destroys the labor of the year; the coldness of the climate, and destructive attacks of worms, to which the cane is subject, requires it to be frequently replanted, and is a serious drawback on the planter, as the growth of one acre is only sufficient to plant four; the same cause also often destroys the cane intended for plants, and blasts his hopes of the ensuing crop. At times high winds, or the negligence of an individual, causing a break in the dike that retains the river, the water rushing down, sweeps buildings, crop, and animals before it, and spreading on all sides carries irresistible ruin with it. Such inundations, by covering the fields with a poor, sandy sediment, often renders them for many years useless, and they are not unfrequent. With such serious evils to contend with, it cannot be expected that the planter of Louisiana can, without some encouragement from the Government, stand in competition with those who rear the plant in its congenial climate; yet it is impossible for him successfully to attend to any other branch of agriculture. Indigo, cotton, tobacco, and sugar, are the only kinds of produce which have as yet been considered as suitable to the country. About thirty years ago the raising of indigo absolutely ceasing to afford the means of subsistence to the cultivator, tobacco, and afterwards, cotton were resorted to; but experience has shown the impossibility of standing in competition with the States of Virginia, Maryland, and Kentucky, with regard to tobacco, from whence our supplies for consumption are at present received, and those of Georgia, the Carolinas, Tennessee, and the Mississippi Territory, in that of cotton. The planters of Louisiana, therefore, hope that the liberal views of Congress will induce that honorable body to come to their aid. As part of the American family they believe it suffices for them to make known their wants to the common parent, to have every proper relief extended to them. But they address it with more confidence, from the conviction that the interests of the Union loudly demand that this distant State should be assisted in securing to herself, and, consequently, to the nation, the vast advantages which its climate and situation promise. With the encouragement of Congress she would in a few years be able to supply her sister States with sugar, rum, and molasses, and will in return consume a considerable portion of their produce and manufactures. Political considerations require also that this distant and frontier State should be strengthened, and its population augmented; let, then, the only kind of agriculture for which nature intended her, which she alone of all the States is capable of producing, and which is at the same time so essentially necessary to all, be fostered and encouraged.

We, therefore, humbly entreat your honorable body that the same sound policy which has hitherto invariably excited the General Government to protect the growing manufactures of our country, and, consequently, made us in many branches completely independent of foreign nations, may be extended to the cultivators of the cane, and that the duties laid during the war on foreign sugar, rum, and molasses, be made permanent by law.

That, during the year 1815, and on the 1st day of January, 1816, Treasury notes charged upon the Sinking Fund fell due amounting to $7,747,280. It was not within the power of the Treasury to make provision for the payment of any part of these notes, or of those which had fallen due, and had not been paid in the preceding year, (with the exception of such as were applied by their holders to the payment of duties and taxes,) until the 1st of July, 1815, when provision was made, and public notice thereof given for the reimbursement of such Treasury notes as had previously to that time become payable at Baltimore and Washington. The same provision was made on the 1st of August for those previously payable at Philadelphia; on the 1st of September for those previously payable at Savannah; and on the days when they respectively become payable, for those reimbursable at all other places, with the exception of New York and Boston; at neither of which places have funds yet been obtained to an extent sufficient to meet the payment of the Treasury notes reimbursable at those two places respectively. PROTECTION TO THE MANUFACTURERS OF COTTON FABRICS.

[Communicated to the House, February 13, 1816.]

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of cotton wool, submitted the following report:

The committee were conscious that they had no ordinary duty to perform, when the House of Representatives referred to their consideration the memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of cotton wool. In obedience to the instructions of the House they have given great attention to the subject, and beg leave to present the result of their deliberations.

They are not a little apprehensive that they have not succeeded in doing justice to a subject so intimately connected with the advancement and prosperity of agriculture and commerce; a subject which enlightened statesmen and philosophers have deemed not unworthy of their attention and consideration.

It is not the intention of the committee to offer any theoretical opinions of their own or of others; they are persuaded that a display of speculative opinions would not meet with approbation. From these views the committee are disposed to state facts, and to make such observations only as shall be intimately connected with, and warranted by them.

Prior to the years 1806 and 1807, establishments for manufacturing cotton wool had not been attempted, but in a few instances, and on a limited scale. Their rise and progress are attributable to embarrassments, to which commerce was subjected, which embarrassments originated in causes not within the control of human prudence.

While commerce flourished, the trade which had been carried on with the continent of Europe, with the East Indies, and with the colonies of Spain and France, enriched our enterprising merchants; the benefits of which were sensibly felt by the agriculturists, whose wealth and industry were increased and extended. When external commerce was suspended the capitalists throughout the Union became solicitous to give activity to their capital. A portion of it, it is believed, was directed to the improvement of agriculture; and not an inconsiderable portion of it, as it appears, was likewise employed in erecting establishments for manufacturing of cotton wool.

To make this statement as satisfactory as possible, to give it all the certainty that it is susceptible of attaining, the following facts are respectfully submitted to the consideration of the House. They show the rapid progress which has been made in a few years, and, evidently, the ability to carry them on with certainty of success, should a just and liberal policy regard them as objects deserving encouragement:

In the year 1800, 500 bales of cotton were manufactured in manufacturing establishments; in 1805, 1,000; in 1810, 10,000; and in 1815, 90,000.

This statement the committee have no reason to doubt; nor have they any to question the truth of the following succinct statement of the capital which is employed, of the labor which it commands, and of the products of that labor:

Capital	- - - -	$40,000,000
Males employed from the age of 17 and upwards	- - - -	10,000
Women and female children	- - - -	66,000
Boys under 17 years of age	- - - -	24,000
Wages of 100,000 persons, averaging $150 each	- - - -	$15,000,000
Cotton wool manufactured, 90,000 bales, amounting to	- - - -	lbs. 27,000,000
Number of yards of cotton of various kinds	- - - -	81,000,000
Cost per yard, averaging 30 cents	- - - -	$24,300,000

The rise and progress of such establishments can excite no wonder. The inducements to industry, in a free Government, are numerous and inviting. Effects are always in unison with their causes. The inducements consist in the certainty and security, which every citizen enjoys, of exercising exclusive dominion over the creations of his genius, and the products of his labor; in procuring from his native soil, at all times, with facility, the raw materials that are required; and in the liberal encouragement that will be accorded by agriculturists to those who, by their labor, keep up a constant and increasing demand for the produce of agriculture.

Every State will participate in those advantages; the resources of each will be explored, opened, and enlarged. Different sections of the Union will, according to their position, the climate, the population, the habits of the people, and the nature of the soil, strike into that line of industry which is best adapted to their interest and the good of the whole; an active and free intercourse, promoted and facilitated by roads and canals, will ensue; prejudices, which are generated by distance, and the want of inducements to approach each other and reciprocate benefits, will be removed; information will be extended; the Union will acquire strength and solidity; and the Constitution of the United States, and that of each State, will be regarded as fountains, from which flow numerous streams of public and private prosperity.

Each Government, moving in its appropriate orbit, performing with ability its separate functions, will be endeared to the hearts of a good and grateful people.

The States that are most disposed to manufactures as regular occupations, will draw from the agricultural States all the raw materials which they want, and not an inconsiderable portion, also, of the necessities of life; while the latter will, in addition to the benefits which they at present enjoy, always command, in peace or in war, at moderate prices, every species of manufacture that their wants may require. Should they be inclined to manufacture for themselves, they can do so with success, because they have all the means in their power to erect and to extend, at pleasure, manufacturing establishments. Our wants being supplied by our own ingenuity and industry, exportation of specie to pay for foreign manufactures will cease.

The value of American produce at this time exported will not enable the importers to pay for the foreign manufactures imported. Whenever the two accounts shall be fairly stated, the balance against the United States will be found to be many millions of dollars. Such is the state of things that the change must be to the advantage of the United States. The precious metals will be attracted to them, the diffusion of which, in a regular and uniform current through the great arteries and veins of the body politic, will give to each member health and vigor.

In proportion as the commerce of the United States depends on agriculture and manufactures, as a common basis, will it increase, and become independent of those revolutions and fluctuations, which the ambition and jealousy of foreign Governments are too apt to produce. Our navigation will be quickened, and, supported as it will be by internal resources never before at the command of any nation, will advance to the extent of those resources.

New channels of trade, to enterprise no less important than productive, are opening, which can be secured only by a wise and prudent policy appreciating their advantage.

If want of foresight should neglect the cultivation and improvement of them, the opportune moment may be lost, perhaps, for centuries, and the energies of this nation be, thereby, prevented from developing themselves, and from making the boon which is proffered our own.

By trading on our own capital, collisions with other nations, if they be not entirely done away, will be greatly diminished.

This natural order of things exhibits the commencement of a new epoch, which promises peace, security, and repose, by a firm and steady reliance on the produce of agriculture, on the treasures that are embosomed in the earth, on the genius and ingenuity of our manufacturers and mechanics, and on the intelligence and enterprise of our merchants.

The Government, possessing the intelligence and the art of improving the resources of the nation, will increase its efficient powers, and, enjoying the confidence of those whom it has made happy, will oppose to the assailant of the nation's rights, the true, the only invincible ægis—the unity of will and strength.

Causes producing war will be few; should war take place its calamitous consequences will be mitigated, and the expenses and burdens of such a state of things will fall with a weight less oppressive and injurious on the nation. The expenditures of the last war were greatly increased by a dependence on foreign supplies; the prices incident to such a dependence will always be high.

Had not our nascent manufacturing establishments increased the quantity of commodities, at that time in demand, the expenditures would have been much greater, and consequences the most fatal and disastrous, alarming even in contemplation, would have been the fate of this nation. The experience of the past teaches a lesson never to be forgotten, and points emphatically to the remedy. A wise Government should heed its admonitions, or the independence of this nation will be exposed to "the shafts of fortune."

The committee, keeping in view the interest of the nation, cannot refrain from stating that cotton fabrics imported from India, interfere not less with that encouragement to which agriculture is justly entitled, than they do with that which ought reasonably to be accorded to the manufacturers of cotton wool. The raw material of which they are made is the growth of India, and of a quality inferior to our own.

The fabrics themselves, in point of duration and use, are likewise inferior to the substantial fabrics of American manufacture. Although the India cotton fabrics can be sold for a lower price than the American, yet the difference in the texture is so much in favor of the American, that the latter may be safely considered as the cheapest.

The distance of most of the Western States from the ocean, the exuberant richness of the soil, and the variety of its products, forcibly impress the mind of the committee with a belief that all these causes conspire to encourage manufactures, and to give an impetus and direction to such a disposition. Although the Western States may be said to be in the gristle, in contemplation of that destiny to which they are hastening, yet the products of manufactures in those States are beyond every calculation that could reasonably be made; contrary to the opinion of many enlightened and virtuous men, who have supposed that the inducement to agriculture, and the superior advantages of that life, would suppress any disposition of that sort of industry. But theories, how ingeniously soever they may be constructed, how much soever they may be made to conform to the laws of symmetry and beauty, are no sooner brought into conflict with facts, than they fall into ruins. In viewing their fragments the mind is irresistibly led to render the homage due to the genius and taste of the architects, but cannot refrain from regretting the waste, to no purpose, of superior intellects. The Western States prove the fallacy of such theories; they appear in their growth and expansion to be in advance of thought; while the political economist is drawing their portraits, their features change and enlarge, with such rapidity, that his pencil in vain endeavors to catch their expression, and to fix their physiognomy.

It is to their advantage to manufacture, because, by decreasing the bulk of the articles, they at the same time increase their value by labor, bring them to market with less expense, and with the certainty of obtaining the best prices.

Those States understanding their interest will not be diverted from its pursuit. In the encouragement of manufactures they find a stimulus for agriculture.

The manufacturers of cotton, in making application to the National Government for encouragement, have been induced to do so for many reasons. They know that their establishments are new and in their infancy, and that they have to encounter a competition with foreign establishments that have arrived at maturity, that are supported by a large capital, and that have from the Government every protection that can be required.

The American manufacturers expect to meet with all the embarrassments which jealous and monopolizing policy can suggest. The committee are sensible of the force of such considerations. They are convinced that old practices and maxims will not be abandoned to favor the United States. The foreign manufacturers and merchants will put in requisition all the powers of ingenuity; will practice whatever art can devise, and capital can accomplish, to prevent the American manufacturing establishments from striking root and flourishing in their rich and native soil. By the allowance of bounties and drawbacks, the foreign manufacturers and merchants will be furnished with additional means of carrying on the conflict, and of insuring success.

The American manufacturers have good reasons for all their apprehensions; they have much at stake; they have a large capital employed, and are feelingly alive for its fate. Should the National Government not afford them protection, the dangers which invest and threaten them will destroy all their hopes, and will close their prospects of utility to their country. A reasonable encouragement will sustain and keep them erect; but, if they fall, they fall never to rise again.

The foreign manufacturers and merchants know this, and will redouble with renovated zeal the stroke to prostrate them. They also know that, should the American manufacturing establishments fall, their mouldering piles, the visible ruins of a legislative breath, will warn all who shall tread in the same footsteps, of the doom, the inevitable destiny of their establishments.

The National Government, in viewing the disastrous effects of a short-sighted policy, may relent, but what can relenting avail? Can it raise the dead to life? Can it give for injuries inflicted the reparation that is due? Industry, in every ramification of society, will feel the shock, and generations will, as they succeed each other, feel the effects of its undulations. Dissatisfaction will be visible every where, and the lost confidence and affections of the citizens will not be the least of the evils the Government will have to deplore. But should the National Government, pursuing an enlightened and liberal policy, sustain and foster the manufacturing establishments, a few years would place them in a condition to bid defiance to foreign competition, and would enable them to increase the industry, wealth, and prosperity of the nation, and to afford to the Government, in times of difficulty and distress, whatever it may require to support public credit, while maintaining the rights of the nation.

Providence, in bountifully placing within our reach whatever can administer to happiness and comfort, indicates plainly to us our duty, and what we owe to ourselves. Our resources are abundant and inexhaustible.

The stand that Archimedes wanted is given to the National and State governments, and labor-saving machinery tenders the lever—the power of bringing those resources into use.

This power imparts incalculable advantages to a nation whose population is not full. The United States require the use of this power, because they do not abound in population. The diminution of manual labor, by means of machinery, in cotton manufacture in Great Britain was, in the year 1810, as two hundred to one.

Our manufacturers have already availed themselves of this power, and have profited by it. A little more experience in making machines, and in managing them with skill, will enable our manufacturers to supply more fabrics than are necessary for the home demand.

Competition will make the prices of the articles low, and the extension of the cotton manufactures will produce that competition.

One striking and important advantage which labor-saving machines bestow is this, that in all their operations they require few men, as a reference to another part of this report will show. No apprehensions can then be seriously entertained that agriculture will be in danger of having its efficient laborers withdrawn from its service.

On the contrary, the manufacturing establishments increasing the demand for raw materials will give to agriculture new life and expansion.

The committee, after having, with great deference and respect, presented to this House this important subject, in various points of view, feel themselves constrained, before concluding this report, to offer a few more observations, which they consider as being immediately connected with it, and not less so with the present and future prosperity of this nation.

Protection to the Manufacturers of Cotton Fabrics.

The prospects of an enlarged commerce are not flattering.

Every nation, in times of peace, will supply its own wants from its own resources, or from those of other nations.

When supplies are drawn from foreign countries, the intercourse which will ensue will furnish employment to the navigation only of the countries connected by their reciprocal wants.

Our concern does not arise from, nor can it be increased by, the limitation which our navigation and trade will have prescribed to them, by the peace and apparent repose in Europe.

Our apprehensions arise from causes that cannot animate by their effects. Look wheresoever the eye can glance, and what are the objects that strike the vision? On the continent of Europe industry, deprived of its motive and incitement, is paralyzed; the accumulated wealth of ages, seized by the hand of military despotism, is appropriated to and squandered on objects of ambition; the order of things unsettled, and confidence between man and man annihilated. Every moment is looked for with tremulous, anxious, and increased solicitude; hope languishes, and commercial enterprise stiffens with fear. The political horizon appears to be calm, but many, of no ordinary sagacity, think they behold signs portentous of a change—the indications of a violent tempest which will again rage and desolate that devoted region.

Should this prediction fail, no change for the better, under existing circumstances, can take place. Where despotism, military despotism, reigns, silence and fearful stillness must prevail.

Such is the prospect which continental Europe exhibits to the enterprise of American merchants.

Can it be possible for them to find in that region sources which will supply them with more than $17,000,000, the balance due for British manufactures imported? this balance being over and above the value of all the exports to foreign countries from the United States. The view which is given of the dreary prospect of commercial advantages accruing to the United States by an intercourse with continental Europe is believed to be just. The statement made of the great balance in favor of Great Britain, due from the United States, is founded on matter of fact.

In the hands of Great Britain are gathered together, and held many powers, which they have not been accustomed hitherto to feel and to exercise.

No improper motives are intended to be imputed to that Government; but does not experience teach a lesson that should never be forgotten—that Governments, like individuals, are too apt “to feel power and forget right?” It is not inconsistent with national decorum to become circumspect and prudent. May not the Government of Great Britain be inclined, in analyzing the basis of her political power, to consider and regard the United States as her rival, and to indulge an improper jealousy—the enemy of peace and repose?

Can it be politic, in any point of view, to mak the United States dependent on any nation for supplies absolutely necessary for defence, for comfort, and for accommodation?

Will not the strength, the political energies of this nation be materially impaired, at any time, but fatally so in those of difficulty and distress, by such dependence?

Do not the suggestions of wisdom plainly show that the security, the peace, and the happiness of this nation depend on opening and enlarging all our resources, and drawing from them whatever shall be required for public use or private accommodation?

The committee, from the views which they have taken, consider the situation of the manufacturing establishments to be perilous. Some have decreased, and others have suspended business. A liberal encouragement will put them again into operation, with increased powers; but, should it be withheld, they will be prostrated. Thousands will be reduced to want and wretchedness. A capital of near $60,000,000 will become inactive, the greater part of which will be a dead loss to the manufacturers. Our improvidence may lead to fatal consequences; the Powers jealous of our growth and prosperity will acquire the resources and strength which this Government neglects to improve. It requires no prophet to foretell the use that foreign Powers will make of them.

The committee, from all the considerations which they have given to this subject, are deeply impressed with a conviction that the manufacturing establishments of cotton wool are of real utility to the agricultural interest, and that they contribute much to the prosperity of the Union.

Under the influence of this conviction the committee beg leave to tender, respectfully, with this report, the following resolution:

Resolved, That, from and after the 30th day of June next, in lieu of the duties now authorized by law, there be laid, levied, and collected, on cotton goods imported into the United States, and the Territories thereof, from any foreign country whatever, — per centum ad valorem, being not less than — cents per square yard.

The number of cotton spindles supposed to be now employed, or ready to be employed, in the United States, are 550,000; but, upon sure grounds, may be stated at 500,000. The capital necessary to carry on the manufacture, including the stock of cotton wool, the yarn in the hands of weavers, the cloth in the hands of the agents, or sold at a credit of six months, added to the real estate, buildings, and machinery, is estimated at seventy-five dollars per spindle, which, on 500,000 spindles, amounts to $37,500,000.

The number of persons employed constantly and steadily may be stated at one hundred thousand of whom not more than one-ninth, or, perhaps, one-tenth are able-bodied men; the rest are infirm, feeble men, or women and children. The manufacture must, also, give incidental employment to a much greater number of persons, in weaving and otherwise, whose ordinary employment is agriculture, and who devote to the manufacture those hours of Winter and bad weather, when the labors of the farm are suspended.

After calculating the cost of the raw material, the labor, interest of money at 6 per cent., insurance, repairs, and other charges, we are of opinion that a duty of at least ten cents on the square yard is necessary for the protection of the American manufacture, and that an ad valorem duty of even 40 or 50 per cent. on the India goods, on account of the lowness of the first cost, would not give the requisite encouragement. It may not be improper here to state that an increase of the duties upon cotton goods, generally, though it might diminish the importation of such goods as we make, would, on the whole, not diminish the receipts of the Treasury, because the increased receipts from such goods as we do not manufacture would counterbalance the loss on such as we do.

With the machinery already erected, the cotton manufacturers can supply the United States with about ninety millions of yards of cotton cloth annually. These consist chiefly of gingham, plaids, bed-ticks, stripes, checks, sheetings, shirtings, and in part of canvass and velvets and other cut stuffs.

At present the coarse shirtings made from yarn No. 12, will bring about 23 cents in New York, at which price they cannot be afforded: the same article has been sold at 33 to 35 cents. The price must necessarily be regulated by the price of cotton wool which during the war was very high at the North, and since the war has been high everywhere.

The principal markets are the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and, in a less degree, Charleston and Savannah: from these cities they are spread over the South and West.

Of the number of spindles now in operation, very few were effectually at work before the war. Such establishments have as yet reaped no profit whatever. Had the whole number been in complete operation before the war, the home competition would have reduced the prices much lower than they were; but the greater number produced no effect till about the conclusion of the war.

We are unable to state, with any exactness, the amount or value of cotton goods imported into the United States in different years; but, to show of how much importance this trade is to Great Britain, we would state that between a quarter and a third of all the exports of British produce and manufacture during the years 1806 and 1807—say £11,417,834, on an average of the two years—were made to the United States. In the same years, the real value of cotton goods exported to the United States from Great Britain (exclusive of Scotland) was, on an average of the two years, £4,393,449, and of woollen goods, £4,591,437—being $19,000,000 of cotton, and $20,000,000 of woollen.

It is proper to add, that there is now one manufactory of cut fustians and velvets at Hudson, and another about to begin at Frankfort, and that these goods require a duty higher than we have proposed for other goods. They cost more—say from 14d. to 30d. per yard of 18 inches width—and therefore will require a duty of 30 cents per square yard for such as cost 23d. and under, and 36 cents for such as cost more.

TARIFF OF DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

[Communicated to the House, February 13, 1816.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 12, 1816.

SIR: In obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d of February, 1815, I have the honor to transmit a report on the subject of a general tariff of duties proper to be imposed on imported goods, wares, and merchandise.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. J. DALLAS.

HON. SPEAKER of the House of Reps.

On the 23d February, 1815, the House of Representatives "Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to Congress, at their next session, a general tariff of duties proper to be imposed upon goods, wares, and merchandise," and, in obedience to that resolution, the Secretary of the Treasury has now the honor to lay before Congress the following report, comprehending—

I. A view of the tariff of the United States, and its incidents upon the Peace Establishment.

II. A statement of the general principles for reforming the tariff of the United States, including the means of enforcement.

III. A general tariff proposed for the consideration of Congress.

I. A view of the Tariff of the United States, and its incidents upon the Peace Establishment.

By an act of Congress, passed on the 1st July, 1812, the permanent duties previously imposed by law upon goods imported into the United States from foreign places were doubled; an addition of 10 per cent. was made to the double duties upon goods imported in vessels not of the United States; and vessels belonging wholly or in part to the subjects of foreign Powers, entering the United States, were charged with an additional tonnage duty of $1.50 per ton. This act was limited in its continuance to the period of one year after the peace with Great Britain, and it expires of course on the 17th of February, 1816. The act (with all its supplements) imposing an additional duty, commonly called the "Mediterranean Fund," of 2½ per cent. ad valorem on all imported goods paying duties ad valorem, and a discriminating duty of 10 per cent upon that additional duty, in respect to all goods imported in vessels not of the United States, had expired on the 3d March, 1815.

Considering the subject, therefore, upon the foundation on which it is placed by the extinction of the Mediterranean Fund, and by the restoration of peace, the annexed table (marked A) exhibits the general tariff of the United States, resulting from the successive acts of Congress imposing, augmenting, and modifying the duties upon imported merchandise, compared with the rates of duties proposed for the new tariff; and it is susceptible of the discrimination marked in the table No. 1, comprising the articles charged with specific duties; No. 2, comprising the articles charged with duties ad valorem, at the several rates of 12½ per cent., 15 per cent., and 20 per cent.; and No. 3, comprising the articles that are free from duty.

It is another important view of the subject, connected with the details of the table A, that the rate of duty upon the tonnage of vessels of the United States, and of the duties upon the goods which they import, is less than upon the tonnage of other vessels, and of their cargoes. Thus:

1. As to the duty on tonnage.

Ships or vessels of the United States entering from any foreign port or place, or carrying goods from one district to another district, are charged at the rate, per ton of - - - 6 cts.

Ships or vessels built within the United States, but belonging wholly or in part to the subjects of foreign Powers, entering from a foreign place or port, are charged at the rate, per ton, of - - 30 do.

Ships or vessels of every other description entering from a foreign port or place, carrying goods from one district to another district within the United States, are charged at the rate, per ton, of - 50 do.

And it may be properly here added that ships and vessels not of the United States, or not wholly owned by American citizens, entering the ports of the United States, are charged by law with the duty called "light money," at the rate, per ton, of - - - 50 do.

2. As to the duty on goods imported.

The discriminating duty imposed by law on goods imported in vessels of the United States is not made a direct charge upon the goods as specified in the table A, but it is charged generally upon the rate of duty imposed on the like goods, when imported in vessels of the United States; and it is uniformly an addition of 10 per cent. upon the American rate of duty, whether that be specific or ad valorem.

The discriminating duty is to be considered, however, in connexion with the treaties and acts of Congress which have subjected it to temporary or permanent modifications. Thus, 1. The Louisiana Convention suspended the discriminating duties for a period of twelve years, (which will expire on the 6th March, 1816,) in relation to French and Spanish vessels and cargoes arriving within the ceded Territory. 2. The convention to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and His Britannic Majesty will suspend the discriminating duties in relation to British vessels and cargoes arriving within the United States from the British territories in Europe, for a period of four years, commencing on the 3d July, 1815. And, 3. The act of the 3d March, 1815, has authorized the abolition of the discriminating duties in relation to every foreign nation which shall abolish such of its discriminating and countervailing duties as are disadvantageous to the United States.

The duty on tonnage is payable at the time of entry; but, before the product of the duties on goods imported reaches the public Treasury, the collection is affected by the credit which the law allows to the importer, and the amount is liable to a reduction, by the allowance of drawbacks and bounties, as well as by the expense of collection.

1st. As to the credit for duties on goods imported.

On the produce of the West Indies, (salt excepted,) and on goods imported by sea from all foreign ports and islands lying north of the equator, and situated on the eastern shores of America, it is three months for one-half, and six months for the other half.

On salt it is nine months.

On Madeira, and all other wines, it is twelve months.

On goods imported from Europe, (other than wines, salt, and teas,) it is eight months for one-third, ten months for one-third, and twelve months for one-third.

On goods (other than wines, salt, and teas) imported from any other place than Europe and the West Indies, it is six months for one-half, nine months for one-fourth, and twelve months for one-fourth.

On teas imported from China or Europe it is conditionally, upon deposits, two years, subject, as intermediate sales may be effected, to payments at four months, eight months, or twelve months, according to the amount of sales, respectively.

2d. As to the drawback of duties on goods exported.

The general provision of the law allows a drawback of the duties on goods imported into the United States, provided they amount to fifty dollars, if the goods be exported within twelve calendar months after the importation to any foreign port or place other than the dominions of any foreign State immediately adjoining to the United States. This local limitation has been modified, however, so as to authorize an exportation, with the benefit of the drawback, from Louisiana to any port or place situated to the southward thereof.

To the general provision of the law for the allowance of drawback there are some exceptions: 1st. The additional duty of ten per cent. imposed upon goods imported in vessels not of the United States, is not the subject of drawback. 2dly. The right of exportation for the benefit of drawback is not allowed in the case of foreign dried and pickled fish, and other salted provisions, fish oil, or playing cards. 3dly. The rate of a half cent per gallon on spirits, with two and a half per cent. on the duties, and the rate of three and a half per cent. on the amount of the duties on all other goods imported, is to be retained, when they are exported for the benefit of drawback, as an indemnification for the expense accrued concerning them.

Tariff of Duties on Imports.3d. As to the allowance of bounties on exports.

The act of the 29th of July, 1813, (which will expire on the 17th of February, 1816,) when it imposed a duty of twenty cents per bushel upon imported salt, allowed a bounty upon all exported pickled fish of the fisheries of the United States, at the rate of twenty cents per barrel, provided the fish were wholly cured with foreign salt, on which a duty had been paid or secured. The same act authorizes an annual allowance to the owners and crews of American vessels and boats employed in the fisheries, graduated according to the tonnage.

The act of the 24th of July, 1813, (which will also expire on the 17th of February, 1816,) when it imposed a duty of four cents per pound upon all sugars refined within the United States, authorized a drawback, in the nature of a bounty, upon all such of the sugar so refined, as should be exported from the United States to any foreign port or place.

4th. As to the expense of the collection of duties on imports.

The successful collection of the duties on imports, before the introduction of the restrictive system, depended more upon the integrity of the commercial community than upon the rigor of the laws, or an expensive vigilance at the custom-house. It is not to be denied or disregarded, however, that soon after that event the spirit of illicit commerce was kindled, that it spread during the late war, and that, with every just reliance upon the honor of the American merchant, measures of great energy have become necessary for the protection of the fair trader, as well as for the security of the revenue. Hitherto the average annual expense of collection may be stated at nearly four per cent. upon the annual product (exclusive of the fees paid by individuals, which may be estimated at one per cent. more) during a season of open and prosperous commerce; and it is believed that the effect of an increased expenditure in the employment of the means which are necessary to prevent and detect offences against the laws, will so augment the product of the duty, as to afford a certain and ample equivalent for the original advance.

The operation of the tariff, exhibited in table A, with the incidents which have been stated, may be concisely viewed with reference to two periods in the commerce of the United States: 1st. Before the introduction of the restrictive system, from 1804 to 1807, both years inclusive; and, 2d, after the introduction of the restrictive system, from 1808 to 1811, both years inclusive. Thus—

*Tariff of Duties on Imports.II. A statement of the general principles for reforming the tariff of the United States, including the means of enforcement.

The tariff which has been thus generally reviewed originated in the year 1790, soon after the organization of the Federal Government. Notwithstanding the various alterations to which it was subjected during the long period of American neutrality, it certainly has not been left in a state adapted to the present epoch. The peace of Europe will give a new course and character to the commerce of the world; and the condition of the United States is essentially changed in population, in wealth, in the employment of labor and capital, in the demand of luxuries, or of necessities for consumption, and in the native resources to supply the demand. These considerations forcibly recommend the measure of revision and reform which is now contemplated; the task, however, is not more important in its object than difficult in the performance. The means of information are scattered and imperfect. Many conflicting interests and prejudices are to be reconciled; and, in the unsettled state of commerce, much of any plan connected with its operations must unavoidably rest upon hypothesis, and be tested by future experiment. In every effort, therefore, to diminish the force of these obstacles, an ulterior reliance upon the wisdom of the Legislature has been respectfully indulged.

In framing the propositions which this report will submit to the consideration of Congress for the establishment of a general tariff, three great objects have been principally regarded: 1st. The object of raising, by duties on imports and tonnage, the proportion of public revenue which must be drawn from that source. 2d. The object of conciliating the various national interests, which arise from the pursuits of agriculture, manufactures, trade, and navigation; and, 3d. The object of rendering the collection of the duties convenient, equal, and certain.

1. The report which the Committee of Ways and Means presented to the House of Representatives on the 9th day of January, 1816, furnishes a foundation to estimate, with sufficient precision, for the present purpose, the proportion of the public revenue to be annually raised through the medium of the customs.

It is there stated that the amount of the annual demands of the Peace Establishment may be placed at the sum of - - - - $15,778,669

But to this sum it is now proper to add the general amount which is appropriated for the payment of the principal of the public debt, estimated at $1,850,000

The difference between the Treasury estimate for the naval service, made upon conjectural ground, and the subsequent statement of the Sec'y of the Navy, made upon official documents, to wit:

The Secretary of the Navy's statement, after adding the sum of $200,000, annually appropriated for three years for the purchase of timber, being - - $3,838,071

The Treasury estimate being - 2,716,510

The difference being	-	1,121,561
And the amount which is proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means to add to the Sinking Fund, (raising it from $8,000,000 to $13,150,000)	-	5,150,000
		$23,900,230

The annual revenue to be raised for the service of Government, may then be stated in round numbers at the sum of $24,000,000, independent of any provision for public institutions and public improvements; such as the President has recommended to the patronage of the Legislature; such as the patriotism of Congress may, from time to time, be induced to sanction; and such as will at once enlighten, enrich, and adorn the nation.

Upon the general principles of public policy, developed in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, the supply for all the expenses of Government will be derived, in part, from internal duties and taxes, but principally from duties on imports.

Stating, therefore, the amount of demand for revenue at - - - - - $24,000,000

It has been proposed to supply annually, from internal duties and taxes, and from the sales of public lands, the sum of $6,925,000; that is to say, from the direct tax on lands, houses, and slaves, the sum of - - - - $2,700,000

From the duty on stills the sum of - - - - 1,200,000

From the duty on stamps the sum of - - - - 400,000

From the duty on refined sugar the sum of - - - - 150,000

From the duty on carriages the sum of - - - - 175,000

From licenses to retailers, (a tax proposed to be modified) the sum of - - - - 900,000

From the duties on sales at auction the sum of - - - - 400,000

From the sales of public lands the sum of - - - - 1,000,000

6,925,000

And the reliance for the residue of the supply must be of course upon the customs, to the amount of - - - - $17,075,000

It is here to be considered, that the report of the Committee of Ways and Means contemplates the abolition, or the reduction of duties or taxes heretofore pledged "to provide for the payment of the expenses of Government, for the punctual payment of the public debt, and for creating a Sinking Fund," to an amount not less than $7,064,340: that is to say—

Tariff of Duties on Imports.

To abolish the duties on furniture and watches, on domestic manufactures, and on distilled spirits, in amount about - - - - -	$3,864,340
To abolish the additional duty on postage, in amount about - - - - -	300,000
And to take from the direct tax, in net amount, about - - - - -	2,900,000
	$7,064,340

And for supplying this sum of $7,064,340, in observance of the plighted faith of the Government, it has been proposed to make an addition to the customs, equal to an average rate of forty-two per cent. upon the products of the duties imposed prior to the act of the 1st of July, 1812, by which the impost was doubled (as already stated) during the continuance of the late war.

If, then, the average annual product of the single duties on imports and tonnage may be estimated (and it cannot be prudently estimated higher) at the sum of - - - - - $12,000,000

The addition of forty-two per cent. upon that amount will yield a sum of - - - - - 5,040,000

And will give, for the amount to be produced by the customs - - - - - $17,040,000

2d. The social compact is formed on the basis of a surrender of a part of the natural rights of individuals, for the security and benefit of the whole society. The Federal compact is formed on the basis of a surrender of a part of the political rights of each State, for the benefit and security of the whole Confederation. Hence, in the attempt "to conciliate the various national interests which arise from the pursuits of agriculture, manufactures, trade, and navigation," it is necessary to recollect that the common object of the nation will not invariably correspond with the separate objects of individuals, or of their professions, nor with the local objects of the respective States, or of the industry of their inhabitants.

Under the beneficent dispensations of Providence, the territory of the United States produces almost all the natural fruits of the earth; and, pursuing the subdivision of which labor is susceptible, the citizens of the United States are engaged in the cultivation of almost every art, and every science, within the scope of human knowledge. But the fruits produced, although they are the fruits of the nation, are not the same in every State; and the labor employed, although it be the labor of the nation, is employed upon very different materials, with very different results in the principal sections of the Union.

From these considerations are derived the principles of general policy by which the national character is formed, and the national interests are maintained. The interests of agriculture require a free and constant access to a market for its staples, and a ready supply of all the articles of use and consumption on reasonable terms; but the national interest may require the establishment of a domestic in preference to a foreign market, and the employment of domestic in preference to foreign labor, in furnishing the necessary supplies. And, again, the interests of foreign commerce flourish most when foreign commerce is the only medium to convey the natural products of the country to a market, and to provide for all the wants of the people in the fabrics of the manufacturer and the artist; but the national interest may require (contemplating equally the state of peace and the state of war) that the people should be as independent in the resources of their subsistence as in the operations of their Government. It must, however, be the aim of every just system of political economy to secure the national interest with as little prejudice as possible to the peculiar interests of agriculture and of commerce.

There are few, if any, governments which do not regard the establishment of domestic manufactures as a chief object of public policy. The United States have always so regarded it. In the earliest acts of Congress, which were passed after the adoption of the present Constitution, the obligation of providing, by duties on imports, for the discharge of the public debts, is expressly connected with the policy of encouraging and protecting manufactures. In the year 1790 the Secretary of the Treasury was directed by the House of Representatives to take the subject of manufactures into consideration, with a view particularly to report upon "the means of promoting such as would render the United States independent of foreign nations for military and other essential supplies." In the year 1810 the Legislature again manifested a marked solicitude to ascertain the progress of the national independence in manufactures, by combining the business of the census with an inquiry into the state of the several manufacturing establishments and manufactures within the several districts, territories, and divisions of the United States. But it was emphatically during the period of the restrictive system and of the war, that the importance of domestic manufactures became conspicuous to the nation, and made a lasting impression upon the mind of every statesman and of every patriot. The weapons and munitions of war, the necessities of clothing, and the comforts of living, were at first but scantily provided. The American market seemed, for a while, to be converted into a scene of gambling and extortion; and it was not the least of the evils generated by the unequal state of the supply and the demand, that an illicit traffic with the enemy, by land and by water, was corruptly and systematically prosecuted from the commencement to the termination of hostilities.

From these circumstances of suffering and mortification have sprung, however, the means of future safety and independence. It has been thought that, with respect to industry applied to manufactures as well as with respect to industry applied to commerce, individuals should be left to pursue their own course untouched by the hand of Government, either to impel or to restrain. Without examining how far this opinion is sanctioned by experience, it is sufficient upon the present occasion to observe that the American manufactures, particularly those which have been introduced during the restrictive system and the war, owe their existence exclusively to the capital, the skill, the enterprise, and the industry of private citizens. The demands of the country, while the acquisition of supplies from foreign nations was either prohibited or impracticable, may have afforded a sufficient inducement for this investment of capital, and this application of labor; but the inducement, in its necessary extent, must fail when the day of competition returns. Upon that change in the condition of the country, the preservation of the manufactures which private citizens, under favorable auspices, have constituted the property of the nation, becomes a consideration of general policy, to be resolved, by a recollection of past embarrassments, by the certainty of an increased difficulty of reinstating, upon any emergency, the manufactures which shall be allowed to perish and pass away, and by a just sense of the influence of domestic manufactures upon the wealth, power, and independence of the Government.

The object to be encouraged and protected merits, in its intrinsic value, as well as in its general influence, the attention of the Legislature. From the peace of 1783, until the year 1808, the march of domestic manufactures was slow but steady. It has since been bold, rapid, and firm; until, at the present period, considering the circumstances of time and pressure, it has reached a station of unexampled prosperity. The attempt, however, to obtain detailed and accurate information upon the subject has only been successful in a very limited degree; and, consequently, the result must be presented to the view of Congress rather as an outline and an estimate than as a complete and demonstrative statement of facts. With this understanding the American manufactures may be satisfactorily divided into three principal classes, allowing for such diversities of shade as will sometimes seem to render the classification of particular manufactures doubtful or arbitrary:

First class. Manufactures which are firmly and permanently established, and which wholly, or almost wholly, supply the demand for domestic use and consumption.

Second class. Manufactures which, being recently or partially established, do not at present supply the demand for domestic use and consumption, but which, with proper cultivation, are capable of being matured to the whole extent of the demand.

Third class. Manufactures which are so slightly cultivated as to leave the demand of the country wholly, or almost wholly, dependent upon foreign sources for a supply.

1st class. In the first class it is believed the following articles may be embraced:

Cabinet wares and all manufactures of wood.
Carriages of all descriptions.

Cables and cordage.

Hats of wool, fur, leather, chip, or straw, and straw bonnets.

Iron castings, fire and side-arms, cannon, muskets, pistols.

Window glass.

Leather, and all manufactures of leather, including saddles, bridles, and harness.

Paper of every description; blank books.

Printing types.

2d class. In the second class it is believed the following articles may be embraced:

Cotton goods of the coarser kinds.

Woollen goods of the coarser kinds generally, and some of the finer kinds.

Metal buttons.

Plated wares.

Iron manufactures of the larger kinds; shovels, spades, axes, hoes, scythes, &c.; nails, large and small.

Pewter, tin, copper, and brass manufactures.

Alum, copperas.

Spirits, beer, ale, and porter.

3d class. In the third class it is believed the following articles may be embraced:

Cotton manufactures of the finer kinds; muslins, nankeens, chintzes, stained and printed cottons of all descriptions.

Linen of all descriptions, linen cambrics, lawns.

Hempen cloths, sailcloth, Russian and German linens.

Silk goods of all descriptions.

Woollen goods of many descriptions; worsted goods of all kinds, stuffs, camblets, blankets, carpets and carpeting.

Hosiery of all descriptions, including knit or woven gloves.

Hardware and ironmongery, excepting the large articles, cutlery, pins, needles.

China ware, earthen ware, porcelain.

Glass of all descriptions, except window glass and phials.

The matured state of the first class of manufactures relieves the task of forming a tariff, with respect to them, from any important difficulty. Duties might be freely imposed upon the importation of similar articles, amounting wholly, or nearly, to a prohibition, without endangering a scarcity in the supply, while the competition among the domestic manufacturers alone would sufficiently protect the consumer from exorbitant prices, graduating the rates of the market generally by the standard of a fair profit upon the capital and labor employed. It is true, however, on the other hand, that, by imposing low duties upon the imported articles, importation would be encouraged, and the revenue increased; but, without adding to the comfort, or deducting from the expense of the consumer, the consumption of the domestic manufacture would, in an equal degree, be diminished by that operation, and the manufacture itself might be entirely supplanted. It is, therefore, a question between the gain of the revenue and the loss of the manufacture, to be decided upon principles of national policy. Under the circumstances of an abundant market the interest of the consumer must stand indifferent, whether the price of any article be paid for the benefit of the manufacturer, or of the importer; but a wise Government will surely deem it better to sacrifice a portion of its revenue, than to sacrifice those institutions which private enterprise and wealth have connected with public prosperity and independence.

The second class of manufactures presents considerations of the most interesting, and not of the least embarrassing nature, in the formation of a tariff. Some remarks have already been made upon the danger which at present threatens those manufactures, as well as upon the policy of rendering them permanently beneficial to the nation; for it is respectfully thought to be in the power of the Legislature, by a well-timed and well-directed patronage, to place them, within a very limited period, upon the footing on which the manufactures included in the first class have been so happily placed, by the lapse of a few years, and the perseverance of a comparatively few individuals. The means of promoting this great object are various, but it appears to have been the early and continued practice and policy of the Government to afford encouragement to domestic products and manufactures, rather by the imposition of protecting duties than by the grant of bounties and premiums; and, indeed, it is in that course alone that the subject properly falls within the scope of the present report. Although some indulgence will always be required, for any attempt so to realize the national independence in the department of manufactures, the sacrifice cannot be either great or lasting. The inconveniences of the day will be amply compensated by future advantages. The agriculturist, whose produce and whose flocks depend for their value upon the fluctuations of a foreign market, will have no occasion eventually to regret the opportunity of a ready sale for his wool or his cotton in his own neighborhood; and it will soon be understood that the success of the American manufacture, which tends to diminish the profit (often the excessive profit) of the importer, does not necessarily add to the price of the article in the hands of the consumer.

Assuming, therefore, the ground, that the manufactures of the second class will be fostered by the legislative care, the amount of the protecting duties, and the mode of imposing them, in order to be effectual, become important considerations. It must be agreed, upon all hands, that the amount of the duties should be such as will enable the manufacturer to meet the importer in the American market upon equal terms of profit and loss, and that the mode of imposing the duties should be such as to secure the resulting competition from the influence of clandestine or illicit practices. There still, however, remains a diversity of opinion as to the amount which will be competent, and as to the mode which will be efficient; and the aim of this report will be to strike the medium which appears to be best established from all the information that has been collected.

The third class of manufactures does not require further attention, at this time, than to adjust the rate of duty to the amount of revenue which it is necessary to draw from them. They have not yet been the objects of American capital, industry, and enterprise, to any important degree; and the present policy of the Government is directed to protect, and not to create, manufactures.

There is, however, a distinct view of the subject which ought not to be omitted. Where the demand for raw materials, or manufactured articles in any of the departments of domestic industry, is wholly, or almost wholly, dependent upon the supply from foreign nations, the access to the American market should be easy, if not entirely free. Acting upon this principle it will be proper, above all, to respect the interests of ship-building and navigation at a period when the equalization of the duties upon tonnage and merchandise, by the operation of acts of Congress and treaties, will probably give rise to an interesting competition between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States. The shipping interest and the manufacturing interest must, however, be reconciled; and, consulting the best interests, the following suggestions are respectfully offered:

1. Imported iron cables, anchors, and bar iron; cables, cordage, hemp, packthread, twine, and seines; sheet copper, copper nails, and lead; so far as they enter essentially into the construction and equipment of ships, and are not supplied by the American manufacturer, ought to be lightly taxed.

2. The case of foreign vessels employed in bringing to the United States goods that are not the growth or manufacture of the country to which the vessels belong, may furnish a proper field for legislative regulations.

3. The case of goods imported from countries which, by law, confine the carriage of such goods to their own vessels, respectively, will also furnish a proper field for similar regulations.

The principles involved in the proposition for a new tariff, in relation to the protection of domestic manufactures, being thus presented for consideration, the more general principles of the system remain to be briefly stated, in relation to the production of the revenue. Thus:

1. Articles intended as the source of revenue should never be so heavily charged with duties as to prevent importation, or much to diminish it.

2. Articles should never be so heavily charged with duties as to create a temptation to smuggle.

3. Articles of great size and weight, of comparatively small value, are difficult to be smuggled; and, other things being equal, they may be charged with higher duties.

4. Articles of small size and great value are easily smuggled, and must be charged with low duties, to destroy the otherwise fatal temptation to evade the law.

5. Articles imported to a great amount should rather be charged with specific duties upon their weight and measure, in order to guard against evasions and frauds, than with ad valorem duties on their value.

The difficulty of carrying the last mentioned rule into practice has been found almost insurmountable. It has been already intimated that, in the classification of manufactures, there were several articles, differently classed, which can scarcely be distinguished from each other, and which could not be separately described with such distinctness and precision as is requisite in a tariff to mark the line of discrimination for different rates of specific duties. In the cotton and woollen manufactures of the United States, for instance, there are several kinds of goods extensively produced, whose names are arbitrary, and continually changing, and whose texture and quality are so various, and so easily altered or disguised, as to elude the vigilance and skill of the custom-house. For this reason, and considering, also, that the ascertainment of duties by the original cost of the goods, according to their weight and measure, is sometimes a source of vexation to the importer, leading, perhaps, to great corruption in the execution of the law, the precedent of the existing tariff has been generally pursued, which subjects all goods, (for example, all cotton and woollen goods,) whether fine or coarse, and whether they are, or are not, of the kinds manufactured in the United States, to one common rate of duty. A general description designates the article, renders the imposition of the duty uniform and certain at all ports of entry, and effectually guards against mistake or evasion.

Upon the principles and with the views, thus stated, the proposition for the new tariff has been formed. The variations from the tariff of permanent single duties consist principally in the following points:

1. The rates of the duties ad valorem are changed in number from three to eight. The increase of the number will not, it is thought, be attended with any disadvantage, and it will, at least, afford a better means of ascertaining, hereafter, the value of articles of different descriptions which are now blended in one class, as well as the amount of the duties collected from each description. The amount of the rates of duties ad valorem is also changed from $12\frac{1}{2}$, 15, and 20 per cent. to $7\frac{1}{2}$, 15, 20, 22, 28, 30, $33\frac{1}{2}$, and 35 per cent.

2. The rates of the specific duties are generally increased upon the amount of the permanent single rates, averaging, with the increase of the rates of duties ad valorem, an aggregate of about 42 per cent. upon the aggregate product of the customs, estimated at about $12,000,000 per annum.

3. The following articles, heretofore free, are charged with duties, to wit:

Alum, per cwt.	- - - - -	$2 00
Copperas, per cwt.	- - - - -	1 50
Copper, in sheets, rods, bolts, or nails, per pound	- - - - -	04
Gum Arabic, and gum Senegal, ad valorem,	$7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Mahogany, per cubic foot	- - - - -	12
Tin plates per box of 100 square feet	- - - - -	1 50
Woods for dying—
Brazil, Braziletto, Camwood, per ton	- - - - -	6 00
Fustic, logwood, per ton	- - - - -	3 00
Nicaragua, per ton	- - - - -	8 00

Wire brass, ad valorem, 22 per cent.

4. The following articles, heretofore subject to an ad valorem duty, are charged with a specific duty, to wit:

Iron, in bars or bolts, per cwt. 75 and 150 cents.
5. The following articles, heretofore subject to specific duties, are charged with duties ad valorem; because the product of the specific duties has been so inconsiderable as to render it useless to distinguish them from the mass of articles charged with duties ad valorem, to wit:
Woollen or cotton cards, former duty per dozen	- - - - -	$0 50
Glauber salts, former duty per cwt.	- - - - -	2 00
Hair powder former duty per lb.	- - - - -	04
Lime, former duty per cask of 60 gallons	- - - - -	50
Malt, former duty per bushel	- - - - -	10
Ochre, yellow, dry, former duty per lb.	- - - - -	01
Ochre, in oil, former duty per lb.	- - - - -	01½
Pewter, plates and dishes, former duty per lb.	- - - - -	04
Starch, former duty per lb.	- - - - -	03
Spanish brown, former duty per lb.	- - - - -	01
Quicksilver, former duty per lb.	- - - - -	06

3. The means of enforcing the tariff.

The means of enforcing the collection of the duties on imports, or, in other words, the means of preventing or detecting frauds upon the revenue, require a prompt, energetic, and steady attention. The remedies to be provided for the existing defects should be particularly applied: 1st. To guard against smuggling, by the clandestine introduction of merchandise, without report, entry, or permit; 2d. To guard against smuggling, in the case of duties ad valorem, by fraudulent entries of merchandise upon fictitious invoices; 3d. To guard against smuggling, in the case of specific duties, by fraudulent entries of merchandise upon false statements of the weight, or the measure; and, 4th. To guard against smuggling, by clandestinely relanding merchandise exported with the benefit of drawback, or by fraudulently obtaining debentures for duties on merchandise exported in cases that are not entitled to the benefit. The details necessary to give effect to a system embracing these objects must unavoidably be postponed until the sense of Congress shall be ascertained; but it is proper, at this time, to bring distinctly into view the essential features of the system. In addition, therefore, to the provisions contained in the laws which now regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, the following propositions are respectfully suggested:

1. That a competent judicial authority be provided to take cognizance of all suits, prosecutions, informations, and libels, for debts, fines, penalties, and forfeitures, arising and accruing under the laws of the United States; a provision rendered indispensable by late decisions of some of the State courts declining such cognizance, in certain cases.

2. That a more competent provision be made for the employment of custom-house officers, cutters, and barges.

3. That an adequate fund be created and set apart for the creation of custom-houses, warehouses, and stores, at the principal ports of entry; a fund to be created, first, by retaining an additional amount of the duties, in cases of exportation for the benefit of drawback; and, secondly, by imposing a small duty, to be called "warehouse money," upon every permit for unloading merchandise.

4. That provision be made to enforce more effectually the duty of reporting and entering vessels, and exhibiting manifests of their cargoes, upon their arrival in any port of the United States; and to abolish the privilege of making port entries.

5. That provision be made to guard more effectually against imposition, under pretence that vessels arrive in distress, that goods are damaged, and that invoices are lost.

6. That provision be made to place all the avenues to the cargoes of the vessels, before unloading, under the seal of the custom-house, and to keep the same more effectually in the charge of the inspectors while unloading.

7. That provision be made that all invoices upon which entries may be effected, shall be endorsed by the American Consul, by a notary public, or by some other trustworthy agent or officer, to be designated, by law, at the place of exportation, certifying the merchandise to be priced "at the then current market price;" that entries shall only be permitted upon invoices so endorsed; and that the invoices shall be conspicuously stamped with the seal of the custom-house at the time of entry.

8. That provision be made authorizing the collectors, in all cases of suspicion, to add to the invoice price of the merchandise ten per cent. beyond the addition now prescribed; and, if the importer refuse to pay duties on that amount, then either to take the merchandise on account of the United States, at the additional price, or to permit an entry upon the original invoice.

9. That provision be made that in all cases the custom-house officers shall send merchandise imported to the public stores for examination; and that they shall be there compared with the invoice, identified as to the kind and quality, ascertained as to the weight and measure, and estimated as to the value.

10. That provision be made requiring from the person who offers to enter merchandise, a declaration whether he acts as owner, consignee, or agent, and whether he has been instructed, after entry, to hold the merchandise to the order of the shipper; in which last mentioned case, the collector may be authorized to suspend the entry, until the shipper, or the person having an order from him, appears to make it.

11. That provision be made requiring the seal of the custom-house to be stamped upon all the original packages, &c., of merchandise entered for exportation, with the benefit of drawback, which shall remain entire at the time of exportation, and which shall be certified by the Consul, or other proper person, to remain entire at the foreign place of landing, in order to discharge the debenture bond.

12. That provision be made more effectually to secure the revenue from fraud and imposition, in the transportation of merchandise from district to district, and generally in carrying on the coasting trade.

13. That provision be made more effectually to secure the revenue from fraud and imposition, in making out invoices in the money of foreign countries, particularly of such countries as employ a paper currency.

But, while these suggestions are offered to guard the collection of the revenue, and to secure to the manufacturer the full benefit of the protecting duties, it must be recollected that there are some provisions in the existing laws which require to be modified in behalf of the merchant. For instance:

1. The time allowed by law to complete the export entries, for the benefit of drawback, is only ten days; and, if not completed within that time, the whole amount of the drawback is forfeited. The period should be extended, and the penalty for non-compliance should be reduced.

2. The right to export merchandise, with the benefit of drawback, ceases at the expiration of a year. The period might, without injury to the revenue, be enlarged.

3. The period allowed for making a return of damaged goods, with a view to a correspondent abatement of the duties, is limited to ten days; and the importer is sometimes charged with the whole duties on perishable articles, under the present restrictions, after the articles have perished, or are greatly decayed. A discretion should be confided to the proper officer, to make a proper abatement of the duties in both cases, upon satisfactory proof of their existence.

III. A general tariff proposed for the consideration of Congress.

Upon the policy and principles which have been stated, the following tariff, in reference to duties, drawbacks, and bounties, has been formed:

Alien duty.

There shall be charged an additional duty of twelve and a half per cent. upon all goods imported in vessels not of the United States, with the exception of goods imported in foreign vessels, which are specially entitled by treaty, or acts of Congress, to be entered upon payment of the domestic duty.

The additional alien duty of twelve and a half per cent. shall not be the subject of drawback in cases of exportation.

Tonnage duty and light money.

Ships or vessels of the United States, entered from any foreign port or place, or carrying goods from one district to another district, shall pay per ton - 6 cents.

Ships or vessels built within the United States, but belonging wholly or in part to the subjects of foreign Powers, entering from a foreign port or place, shall pay per ton - 30 "

Ships or vessels, of every other description, entering from a foreign place or port, or carrying goods from one district to another within the United States, shall pay per ton - 50 "

Ships or vessels not of the United States, or not wholly owned by American citizens, entering the ports of the United States, shall pay for "light money" per ton - 50 "

But the additional duty upon tonnage, and the light money imposed upon foreign vessels, are not to be exacted in the case of foreign vessels specially entitled by treaty or acts of Congress to an entry upon domestic duties and charges only.

Warehouse money.

To constitute a fund for erecting and maintaining custom-houses, warehouses, and stores,

1. There should be paid for every permit to unlade goods, twenty-five cents.

2. There shall be retained upon the amount of the duties of goods exported, for the benefit of drawbacks, (except spirits,) five per cent.

3. There shall be retained in the case of spirits exported, for the benefit of drawback, two cents per gallon, and also three per cent. on the amount of the duties.

A separate account shall be kept at the custom-house of the money collected for this fund; and the amount shall be expended, from time to time, under such directions as the President of the United States shall approve and authorize.

Drawbacks and bounties.

There shall be allowed a drawback of the duties on goods imported into the United States, if the goods be exported within twelve months after the time of importation, subject to the following exceptions and provisions:

1. There shall not be an allowance of drawback in the case of goods imported in foreign vessels from any of the dominions or colonies of any foreign Power to which the vessels of the United States are not permitted to trade.

2. There shall not be an allowance of drawback for the additional duty of twelve and a half per cent. imposed on goods imported in vessels not of the United States.

Tariff of Duties on Imports.

3. There shall not be an allowance of drawback in the case of foreign dried and pickled fish and other salted provisions, fish oil, or playing cards.

4. There shall be retained upon the amount of the duties of goods exported for the benefit of drawback, (except spirits,) five per cent.

5. There shall be retained in the case of spirits exported, for the benefit of drawback, two cents per gallon, and also three per cent. on the amount of the duties.

6. The present bounties, allowances, and drawbacks, shall be continued in the case of exporting pickled fish, of the fisheries of the United States; in the case of American vessels employed in the fisheries; and in the case of exporting sugar refined within the United States.

These provisions respecting drawbacks must, however, be conformed to the privileges specially allowed to foreigners by treaty, or by acts of Congress.

It only remains, in the performance of the task prescribed by the House of Representatives, to give a succinct statement of the probable product of the duties upon imports, according to the proposed tariff.

The annual product of the single duties has been estimated at $12,000,000; and of this sum, the specific duties produced about - $7,200,000

The duties ad valorem produced about 4,800,000

But the amount proposed to be raised by the new tariff being - - - 17,000,000

Such additions must be made to the old tariff as will produce - - $5,000,000

The additions to the old tariff are made, first upon the specific duties; and, secondly, upon the duties ad valorem; and the estimated amount of the additions may be thus stated :

First. Of the additions to the specific duties.

Principal articles.	Former duty.	Proposed duty.	Former average product.	Estimat'd product of additional duty.

Total additional amount estimated to be derived from specific duties - -	- - - -	- - - -	-	$1,200,000

Second. Of the additions to the duties ad valorem.

Carriages - - - -	20 per cent. -	35 per cent. -	75 per cent. -

Report on the Public Debt.

It is not practicable to ascertain the amount of revenue heretofore produced by each of the classes of goods specified in the last table; but it is sufficiently known that some of them produced little, while the product of others was proportionably great. Taking the whole, however, together, it is estimated that the proposed increase of duty is equal to one hundred per cent. upon the aggregate amount of the former ad valorem duties. But the effects to be expected from the increased duties on woollen and cotton goods, from the diminution of the alien duties under treaties or acts of Congress, and from other considerations involved in the new system, will not permit a higher estimate of the aggregate product of the increased rates of the ad valorem duties than the rate of seventy-five or eighty per cent. upon the former product.

Assuming, then, an advance of eighty per cent. upon $4,800,000, (the aggregate product of the duties ad valorem, as above stated,) the sum will be - - - - - $3,840,000

And adding to this sum the amount produced as above stated by the increase of the specific duties - - - 1,200,000

There will be produced, to complete the amount of additional revenue required, a sum of - - - - - $5,040,000

All which is respectfully submitted.

PUBLIC DEBT.

[COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE, MARCH 2, 1816.]

Treasury Department, February 28, 1816.

In obedience to the resolution of the 12th of February, 1816, inquiring "what additions, if any, have been made to the funded public debt, and to the floating public debt, since the 30th day of September last," the Secretary of the Treasury has the honor to lay before the House of Representatives the following report:

I. That, by the annual report upon the state of the finances of the United States, presented on the 6th December, 1816, it appears that the balance of the whole of the public funded debt, contracted before the war, amounted, on the 30th of September, 1815, to the sum of - - - $39,135,484 96
That, on the 1st of January, 1816, there was reimbursed of the principal of that debt (besides the payment of the interest) the sum of - - - 799,652 38
And that, at this time, the balance of the whole of the public debt contracted before the war amounts to the sum of - - - - - 38,335,832 58

II. That, by the annual report, it also appears, that the estimated amount of the whole of funded public debt, in reference to the late war, was, on the 30th of September, 1815, the sum of - - - - - $63,144,972 50
That, to this amount, there have been added the following items, since the 30th of September, 1815:

1. In six per cent. stock of 1814, at the rate of $100 in stock for $80 in money, to pay the city of Charleston, according to the contract, for a loan made during the late war - - - - - $204,889 23.
2. In six per cent. stock of 1814, in lieu of Treasury notes funded at ninety-five per cent., and which so far operates to reduce the amount of the floating debt due on the 30th of September, 1815 - - - 2,206,954 21
3. In six per cent. stock, in lieu of Treasury notes funded at par, and which so far operates to reduce the amount of the floating debt due on the 30th September, 1815 - - - 2,057 00
4. In seven per cent stock, in lieu of small Treasury notes funded at par, estimated at - - - - - 2,815,871 00

Amount of the addition, since the 30th of September, 1815, to the public funded debt contracted in reference to the war - - - - - 5,229,772 44

Estimated amount of the whole of the public funded debt on the 12th of February, 1816, contracted in reference to the late war - - - - - $68,374,764 94

III. That by the annual report, it also appears that the amount of the floating public debt on the 30th of September, 1815, was - - - - - $17,355,101 00
14th Con. 1st Sess.—54

Report on the Public Debt.

To this sum there have been added, between the 30th of September, 1815, and 12th of February, 1816, the following items:

1. There have been issued and reissued small Treasury notes, amounting, as is estimated, to the sum of - - - - -	$3,471,537 00
2. There have been issued Treasury notes bearing interest at five and two-fifths per cent., the sum of - - - - -	2,704,600 00	6,176,137 00
3. There have been obtained temporary loans from sundry banks in the District of Columbia, under the act of the 13th of February, 1815, providing for the reconstruction of the public buildings at Washington - - - - -	100,000 00
		$23,631,238 00

But the floating debt has been diminished during the same period in the following manner:

1. By the subscription of Treasury notes to the six per cent. loan, as above stated, at the rate of $100 in stock for $95 in principal and interest of Treasury notes. Stock having been issued to the amount of $2,206,955 21, produced a reimbursement of Treasury notes amounting to - - - - -	$2,096,607 53
But of this sum there was included an estimate, in the sum of $4,315,000, stated as thus reimbursed in the annual report, the sum of $1,153,412 94, contracts for sundry sums uncertain in their amount, having been made, but not completed at that time, and which, therefore, is now deducted - - - - -	1,153,412 94
2. By funding Treasury notes at par for six per cent. stock, as above stated - - - - -	$2,057 00
3. By funding small Treasury notes for seven per cent. stock, as above stated - - - - -	2,815,871 00
4. By the payment in Treasury notes of duties and taxes, estimated to have amounted, in Treasury notes bearing interest, to the sum of - - - - -	$2,650,000
In small Treasury notes, to the sum of - - - - -	50,000
	2,700,000 00
5. By the repayment of temporary loans, viz: To the Bank of the State of South Carolina - - - - -	50,000
To the Mechanics' Bank, New York - - - - -	200,000
	250,000 00	6,711,122 59

Estimated amount of the whole of the floating debt, on the 12th of February, 1816 $16,920,115 41

IV. That, from the preceding estimates, it appears that, on the 12th of Feb'y, 1816, the aggregate amount of the public debt was the sum of $123,630,692 93, consisting of the following items:

1. Funded public debt before the war - - - - -	$38,335,832 58
2. Funded public debt contracted since the war - - - - -	68,374,744 94
3. Floating public debt outstanding - - - - -	16,920,115 41
	$123,630,692 93

That the aggregate amount of the public debt on the 30th September, 1815, was the sum of - - - - - 119,635,558 46

And that the aggregate addition since 30th of September, 1815, is - - - - - $3,995,134 47

All which is respectfully submitted.

Protection to Manufacturers of Woollen Fabrics.

PROTECTION TO MANUFACTURERS OF WOOLLEN FABRICS.

[Communicated to the House, March 6, 1816.]

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to which were referred the memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of wool, submitted the following report:

The committee, having given this subject all the consideration that its importance merits, beg leave to present, with due respect to the House, the result of their investigations.

The correctness of the following estimate the committee are no way disposed to question:

Amount of capital supposed to be invested in buildings, machinery, &c.	- - -	$12,000,000
Value of raw material consumed annually	- -	$7,000,000
Increase of value by manufacturing	- -	12,000,000
Value of woollen goods manufactured annually	- - -	19,000,000
Number of persons employed	constantly 50,000 occasionally 50,000
	<hr/>	100,000

The committee having in a report presented to the House on the 13th of February last, on the memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of cotton, expressed their opinion on the policy of fostering manufacturing establishments, consider themselves relieved from the necessity of repeating the same arguments. Every reason then urged for sustaining the cotton manufacturing establishments applies with equal force in favor of the woollen. The committee, influenced by the same reasons, feel themselves bound to accord the same justice to the manufacturers of wool.

The following resolution is, therefore, with due respect submitted to the House:

Resolved, That, from and after the 30th day June next, in lieu of the duties now authorized by law, there be laid, levied, and collected on woollen goods imported into the United States and Territories thereof, from any foreign country whatever, — per centum ad valorem.

To the honorable the chairman and members of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

GENTLEMEN : Being informed that you are preparing to submit to Congress a report on the subject of manufactures, as connected with the national prosperity of the country, we, the subscribers, respectfully submit the following remarks respecting the capital employed in the woollen business in the United States, the number of persons employed, the quantity of wool consumed, and the aggregate amount of all the woollen cloth now manufactured.

At this time there are in the State of Connecticut alone twenty-five establishments for the manufacture of woollen cloths, employing twelve hundred persons, and as many more indirectly who do not immediately appertain to the establishment. The capital already invested therein amounts to four hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and they are capable of making, and probably do manufacture annually, equal in amount to three hundred and seventy-five thousand yards of narrow, or one hundred and twenty-five thousand yards of broadcloths. Besides this quantity made at the establishments, it is calculated there are five hundred thousand yards made annually in families and dressed in the country clothiers' shops; part of which is regularly sold to the country stores; doing away, thus far, their former practice of supplying themselves with British goods of a similar description. The value of all the woollen cloths thus manufactured, at the lowest estimate, is about $1,500,000, making a home market for a staple of nine hundred thousand pounds of wool, or the produce of four hundred thousand sheep. With regard to the whole quantity of woollen goods manufactured in the United States we cannot at present speak with precision; but, from the best information obtained there is at this time annually manufactured in all the States to the amount of $19,000,000, requiring a capital, in buildings and machinery, of $12,000,000, and employing fifty thousand persons immediately in the business, and as many more indirectly. With that encouragement which we deem it the policy of the Government to bestow on this branch of our industry, the quantity of woollens manufactured in this country would be doubled in four years, and nearly sufficient to supply the whole demand of the United States.

When it is considered that the woollen manufacture is now making a home market for an important staple of our country, equal in value to $7,000,000; that the product of its industry, equal to $19,000,000, is a great gain of national wealth, in giving employment to various kinds of labor, at the same time preventing foreigners from drawing great resources from us in the sale of their manufactures; that it produces an interest in the country that, under all circumstances, is an American interest; the policy of giving it the necessary support becomes obvious to every unprejudiced mind. At the same time that it is aiding and encouraging agriculture in consuming her productions, it is in no degree taking from her the labor necessary to carry on her operations. A great proportion of the woollen manufacture is done by the assistance of labor-saving machinery, which is almost exclusively superintended by women and children, and the infirm, who would otherwise be wholly destitute of employment; whereas they are now able to maintain themselves. The manual labor employed is of that class who, from their previous habits and occupations in life, are wholly unfitted for agricultural pursuits; and who, if not thus employed would, in most instances, be a burden on society. Among this description are to be numbered many valuable foreigners who are daily arriving among us in needy and indigent circumstances, and whose only employment has been in the manufacturing business at home. In the exchange between the different States of the manufactured goods, and of the raw materials, and in the growing wants of many foreign articles, as dye stuffs, &c., the commerce of our country, particularly the coasting trade, is equally benefited with our agriculture.

If the woollen manufacture does not languish for want of necessary support from Government at this time, there cannot be a doubt but in the course of a very few years we shall be able to supply the whole demand of the United States, and at a lower rate than our manufacture can be imported from abroad. Great Britain excludes all woollen goods, nor suffers a yard of cloth to be exported except in a finished state. It is not now a question with her manufacturers who shall sell at highest prices, but, who can manufacture the cheapest; and this competition has enabled her to undersell all the nations in Europe. The same encouragement to the business in this country will produce a like competition, and enable us, eventually, to undersell her even in foreign markets. The amount of woollen cloths now imported into the United States is supposed to be about —.

The quantity now manufactured is about $19,000,000 in value. It is a business susceptible of an increase of twenty-five or thirty per cent. annually; so that, in the course of five years at least, we may be able to clothe ourselves independent of any foreign nation, and give a new stimulus to agriculture which is now languishing from the necessity of depending upon a precarious foreign market for most of her important productions.

We remain, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient humble servants,

ARTHUR W. MAGILL,
WM. YOUNG.

My actual experience being principally in the cotton manufacture, my entire belief in the correctness of the preceding statement is founded on my knowledge of the gentlemen who have signed it; I, therefore, cheerfully add my name.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

The memorial and petition of the subscribers, manufacturers of woollen articles in the States of

New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, on behalf of themselves and others engaged in similar manufactures in the said States, respectfully sheweth: That your memorialists are impelled by the situation of their manufacture, and the effects which may be produced upon it by the contemplated measures of Congress, respectfully, to offer their sentiments, and to point out those circumstances in which they conceive their interests and that of the public are so united as to merit the most serious attention of the National Legislature.

Your memorialists beg leave to remind Congress that, from the first settlement of the country, domestic manufactures have formed an important feature of its industry; these, founded on the genius of its inhabitants, and the arts they brought or have acquired from Europe, have introduced and established many of the most useful manufactures, among which none is more conspicuous than that of woollen; this has not only increased as fast as the agriculture of the country supplied the raw material, but whenever any circumstances have given it further encouragement, it has shown itself sufficiently founded in the wants and ability of the country to go beyond this, and to rise in a very material degree to its support. Such was the case during the stamp act and the Revolutionary war, when the woollen manufacture became greatly extended; but the raw material, the population and general ability of the country were then all too feeble to give it a decided permanent establishment, so that, upon the renewal of intercourse with foreign nations, it sunk again under a competition with their manufactures, until within the last five years, when many circumstances have arisen, and particularly two, viz: the introduction of sheep, and the separation from Europe by the war, which have given to the manufacture such a basis, that its complete establishment in the country is no longer doubtful.

The introduction of sheep, and particularly of the merino breed, gave to the country at once an agricultural object, which every State in Europe had been striving to realize, but without an immediate demand for the wool it would not have been realized here, at least at the time and to the extent which has been done, for while it furnished the raw material, it was the immediate manufacture which afforded the price and demand for that material, and occasioned its present extension and establishments.

It is notorious that, during the period referred to, a great number of the citizens of these States have devoted themselves both to the breed of sheep, and the woollen manufactures; that vast capitals have been expended, and large establishments every where diffused through the States, which have supplied the public wants, and shown themselves capable of great future extension, so that altogether a national object has been erected, uniting the features of agriculture and commerce in so eminent a degree as conspicuously to demand the attention of the Government in all those acts which are directed to its national economy.

Protection to Manufacturers of Woollen Fabrics.

Your memorialists beg leave to state that, upon the introduction of the merino breed of sheep, the prices which the manufacturers afforded for their wool were high beyond that of every other country; so that the encouragement it received was precisely such as the infant arts almost always require on their introduction, and other countries have been obliged to give by legislative provision: accordingly, the breed of sheep has been permanently fixed and diffused over the soil of the United States without any other aid. At present the prices which the manufacturers allow are still higher than those abroad, although wool is now much dearer in Europe than the usual level of peace prices, chiefly owing to the demand for manufactures to be sent here.

It is thus that the import of our clothing operates with the double disadvantage: first, of keeping up the raw material of Europe by manufacturing it for our use; and, secondly, depressing that material here by impairing the manufactures of our own; in both cases the agricultural object is effected through the manufacture, and in the proportion as that is encouraged abroad, so both are depressed at home.

It is vain to pretend that the breed of sheep can be maintained in these States by an export of the wool; even the present prices in Europe will not admit of it; and if they decline, as they unquestionably will, under a peace establishment, it is out of the question. In the year 1800 the average price of British wool was less than twenty cents per pound, which, after the expense of export, could in no way support the growth of it here; at this moment the prices of wool are higher here than abroad, and, if the manufacture is supported, they will probably always remain so, since the charges of export and import give them a material support. Besides this, it is by manufactures actually existing on the spot where the wool is grown, that it receives its surest encouragement. These furnish an immediate market, and teach the agriculturist all the improvements in quality, by which excellence is obtained; of this the whole history of the material furnishes a proof. It was by the refined manufactures of the Arabs in Spain, that the fleeces of that country received those improvements, which the laws of the Mesta now barely support; and the present variety and goodness of the British wool has been obtained by its manufactures. No doubt, therefore, can exist as to the fact that it is through the medium of the manufacture that the growth of the wool can be improved, or even maintained, in these States.

Our manufacturers have already furnished a large quantity of superfine cloths, of coarse cloths, and many new articles peculiarly suited to our climate. In their infancy they could scarcely be expected to furnish all that the country demanded, or to obtain the perfect excellence of nations who had manufactured them for ages. But it is notorious, that the quantity was rapidly becoming sufficient for our consumption, and that a large proportion of our cloths were equal to the best in Europe. What deficiencies existed would have soon yielded to existing skill; and one object was obtained with certainty, viz: that of giving the country a large amount of substantial clothing, with every moderate degree of excellence, and inferior only to articles of refined luxury.

On this head your memorialists beg leave to remark that, although the importation of foreign manufactures comprises a great number of most useful articles essential to the wants of the country, yet a large proportion of it consists of those which are more alluring by their fashion than their use. The wealth of Europe encourages these at home, and a constant supply of them is required by its luxury and the state of its arts, which are better rewarded by these refined inventions than the more useful ones. Here, without railing against the introduction of elegance, and even a moderate degree of luxury itself, it is certain that our own manufactures are depreciated more by the novelty and fashion of foreign articles than by those which are the most useful; and that a very great proportion of our wealth goes abroad for the allurements which foreigners present to us. While, therefore, we can supply ourselves with articles sufficient for every moderate degree of gratification, it is consistent with the practice of the wisest nations, and the soundest principles of political economy, that they should be encouraged; and that foreign articles which interfere with them should be made the objects of revenue by Government, which those who use them ought to pay.

Almost every nation has now adopted the system of making its revenue laws the organ of protection to its arts; and this system having been already used in these States, a universal conviction prevails that Congress will make it one of the bases of the new tariff of duties. Your memorialists are, therefore, impressed with the belief that it must be desirable to Congress to obtain correct information of what precise duties the interests of the manufacturers demand, and it is their sincere desire to furnish such information as to that in which they are engaged.

Upon this head your memorialists beg leave to remark that they do not wish for a rate of duties which may injure any other department of industry, or give an excessive encouragement to their own; their sole object is such as will prevent their individual ruin, and maintain the manufacturing establishments of the country. It is certain that a considerable duty is necessary for this purpose, and there are some circumstances which may enable us to fix it with tolerable precision. Under the old duties, previous to the war, there was not encouragement enough to introduce the woollen manufacture, so that it appears certain that these duties would not now maintain it. Under the present duties it has languished, and in a considerable degree declined since the peace; yet there is reason to hope that when the shock first given by foreign import subsidies, they may be maintained with a moderate, though certainly not with a great profit to the manufacturer. There are two circumstances which prevent a more precise opinion on this subject; first, the almost certain decline of the prices abroad; and the next, the excessive importation of the present year, which has lowered prices here beyond their fair or accurate value. The last of these is accidental, though it may often occur again, and the best checks for it exists in considerable duties. Of the former, the extent cannot yet be ascertained; it is certain, however, that future improvement in the state of the manufacture here is less to be looked for than discouragement; so that, without any speculative calculations upon what may occur, but taking what we know as our guide, it seems certain that the present duties may maintain the manufactures of the country, but that unquestionably nothing less will do it.

Your memorialists might urge a great number of facts and further reasoning to show the propriety of fixing the duties at the rate they have mentioned, or even higher, but they are not desirous unnecessarily to swell this memorial into a trespass upon the attention of Congress. It appears proper, however, that, in expressing their sentiments as to their own manufacture, they should also express those they feel for others, and particularly the two great objects of agriculture and commerce. It is certain that all the three great divisions of labor ought to receive the patronage and support they require without partiality, and they trust the wisdom of Congress will always afford it when necessary.

Your memorialists, however, cannot but remark that the agriculture and commerce of these States already rest upon a basis which does not appear easily impaired; the agriculture, directed to objects in universal demand for the most necessary wants of mankind, derives from these wants the surest support, and whenever the introduction of new objects of cultivation, or the support of the old require legislative aid, they ought, and will, doubtless, receive it; in the same manner the carriage of our vast produce gives a support to our commerce equally permanent. The two united afford a solid aid to each other; the agriculture by furnishing the means, and commerce, by exploring the sources of supply. It is thus that both possess a foundation which, aided by a just protection of our rights, and by those favorable regulations which it has always been the object of Congress to make, presents at once a stimulus and support to the existing agriculture of our country which will extend it over all our soil.

But manufactures advance with a feebleness; those which are matured to the highest excellence often depend, in their infancy, upon individual exertion, and they have a peculiar species of competitors in the population, the skill, and long experience of other nations, above all, in the jealousy with which each nation watches its own arts; their whole history, therefore, is a record that, in the introduction of them into any nation, there is a period when public aid is essential, and that they cannot be introduced without it. In every State they furnish the greatest resources of commerce, as may be seen by the vast carriage required by manufactured articles. This sort of aid has already been given to the commerce of the United States by their manufactures: a great portion of our agricultural produce is already doubled in value before it leaves us, and is carried to other nations in a shape which still more enhances it. Our flour, for instance, would not be applied to the supply of many countries without manufacture, and the produce of our minerals and forests requires this sort of conversion, often, to give them value at all; but, beyond the resource thus furnished to commerce, the supply of our wants at home, and the independence of the country are objects of still greater importance. In this way our wealth is increased by saving it, the genius of our citizens awakened, their industry rewarded, and the value of every portion of labor enhanced at home, instead of encouraging the agriculture, commerce, and manufacturing skill of other nations.

Your memorialists feel no doubt that the applications of other manufacturers will receive the same attention from Congress as their own, and especially that of the cotton manufacturers; leaving these, then, to what they can urge with more propriety for themselves, they cannot but remark that the cotton manufacture bids fair to supply so large a portion of our clothing, as to free that of wool from the fears which might be entertained as to its inability to furnish a sufficient supply for the country. It is certain that our resources for the cotton manufacture are unbounded, and that, in our climate, it will furnish a vast portion of our clothing; the extension of the growth of wool and its manufacture, therefore, are such as to leave no reasonable doubt but that, under proper encouragement, it will, at no very distant period, supply all our remaining wants, and especially those articles for which wool is essential.

Your memorialists cannot conceive that, at this period, any friend to this country would draw distinctions between its various establishments unfavorable to either. Speculative theories derived from other countries or other ages can rarely be applied, with justice, to our own; but if these theories are indulged they can only be drawn from abuses or a state of society different from what we enjoy. The manufactures abroad may be considered as of two distinct kinds; the one consisting of great commercial establishments, to which the whole mass of society is devoted; the other those of a more confined character, which run hand in hand with agriculture, and afford a useful aid to commerce, without becoming its sole support. The latter exists throughout all the continent of Europe, and nourishes every other application of labor; the former exists chiefly in Great Britain, from whence we derive some of the most useful, and all the injurious ideas of manufactures. Her institutions, however, are derived from her peculiar situation; abounding in minerals, and with a soil incapable of sustaining her inhabitants, she is compelled to an unbounded scope of manufactures to sustain her commerce, and to feed her people. In these, however, it is from momentary abuses in some of her manufactures alone, that injurious impressions of them are derived; for if we examine them all, with proper discrimination, we shall find that the far greater part of them, and particularly her woollen manufacture, comprises the most free and comfortable portion of her population; this character applies to every State of the Continent. France and Germany have, for ages, carried on large manufactures, without the least injury to their people, or their agriculture; and the history of Europe will prove that manufactures have been, in every age, the nurseries of its freedom and prosperity. To their existence liberty is essential; for to raise or to buy the raw materials, to sell their productions, or to pursue their inventions and skill, requires that freedom from restraint which first compelled the feudal lords of Europe to emancipate their artists, while they chained their agricultural subjects to the soil. From hence the cities of Italy first rose into free States, and the progress of the useful arts nourished the Reformation, and gave to the cities of Germany and Flanders, to Geneva, and to Nismes, a portion of liberty which no other part of Europe possessed.

Your memorialists cannot ask for an encouragement injurious to any portion of their fellow-citizens, or the interests of their country. The mass of labor here, as elsewhere, is comprised in the three great divisions of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures; but these are so connected that benefit bestowed on one must extend to all. Under a free constitution and equal laws, the children of the State justly ask the same patronage, to whichever object they direct their industry. Our population has now risen to a large amount, and a considerable portion of it is comprised in our cities and towns; these are necessary to nourish the more diffused districts of agriculture, by furnishing them with markets, and supplying those wants for which a combination of labor is required; hence their application to manufactures is at once natural and essential. Besides these, our numerous streams of water, our minerals, our woods, and our tillage, all invite to the employment of manufacturing skill. In this the choice will always be best determined by the most necessary wants of the country; and what we ask is, not to direct or give to manufactures an unnatural aid, but to protect them from foreign injury. For a long period, it is none but the most necessary which can be reared, and while our vast territory, and the unbounded scope it offers for agricultural labor will, perhaps, forever prevent the introduction of any other, the settlement of that territory itself will proceed with the surer step, as we become independent in our resources.

There are two facts of considerable importance, which your memorialists believe may be fully established: first, that the import of foreign goods in most years, and particularly in the present one, already exceeds the value we can pay by our exports. This circumstance is in a great degree similar to what occurred upon the peace of 1783, when the country was so inundated with foreign articles that the manufactures were destroyed, and our citizens torn to pieces for many years to pay for them. The late wars in Europe by presenting new and extraordinary objects of commerce to us, retrieved our embarrassments, and threw into the country a mass of wealth which overpaid the deficiency of our proper exports; but these extraordinary objects are not to be expected in peace, when the balance against us must again increase, unless we can prevent it by our domestic economy.

The other fact is, that the manufactures of the country, altogether, have become so important that the carriage of raw materials from abroad, (chiefly of kinds we do not produce at all, or not in sufficient quantities,) actually exceeds, in point of tonnage, that which is employed in manufactured articles; and if, to the tonnage thus employed abroad, we add that which conveys our raw materials and manufactures coastwise, we shall find that they already support a most important part of our commerce, of that kind which we can secure and extend in peace, and which is of all others the most interesting to the country, viz: the increase and employment of our ships and seamen, to whom freights are the proper objects of employment, and it will be at once perceived how much these are increased by the import of such articles as hemp, iron, copper, lead, brimstone, and the like, over fine and costly manufactures.

Your memorialists are sensible that very erroneous ideas have prevailed as to the profit yielded by the woollen manufacture, which has been considered as very great during the war. In order to counteract this opinion, which is incorrect, your memorialists state that when the manufacture was begun, just before the war, washed merino wool was at less than one dollar per pound, but that, during the war, it rose to three dollars, so that the wool in a yard of cloth cost at least six dollars, and the materials for finishing it and workmanship were equally high; it was these, therefore, and not the profit, that enhanced the price of cloth; and they prove that the manufacture was actually instituted at the risk of the manufacturer himself, but that the profit was largely shared with the agriculturist and other laborers of the country; besides which, it is certain the profit, whatever it was, came at a fortunate period to introduce the manufacture and supply the country; nor has it been employed long enough to give either a reward or fair experiment to the introducers of it; since the period has been so short that a great part of it has necessarily been taken up in forming the establishments, at great cost, and they are always known to be least productive for the first few years. At present, the manufacturer here can afford to make a piece of cloth at about the same price as it may be imported for, that is, at eight dollars per yard; but he cannot make it here for what it can be made in England, because the materials and workmanship are both much higher here; nor is the cost of carriage and old duties enough to pay the difference. It absolutely requires the whole of the present duties, as they now exist, and these cannot be considered as high when it is seen that they are to comprise all the manufacturer's profit, and protect him from all his disadvantages, especially the following: first, the higher prices he pays here for the wool, the machinery, and the workmanship; second, the probable depression of wool and cloth abroad; thirdly, the enormous import sold here below their cost; and, lastly, the prejudice of the country in favor of foreign fabrics.

Your memorialists cannot but conclude by expressing their conviction that the absolute fate of their manufacture depends on the determination of Congress, and with it the fate of a great number of citizens who have engaged in it; that they entered into it under the encouragement given by the late war, is correct, as without encouragement from some source no important institution would ever be begun; but it is certain that neither now, nor upon any future occasion, could the citizens of the United States be supposed to embark in such undertakings, where the private hazard is always great, solely upon the precariousness of public measures; to look forward, therefore, to the public patronage when they might require it, was, as it ever will be, a reasonable resource, upon which every man who engages in such undertakings must depend. It is, then, with confidence that they now rely upon the measures of Congress for that protection which is essential to them, and with them to the woollen manufacture and growth of wool in the United States; and they respectfully pray that Congress, taking the premises into its most serious consideration, will grant the protection they require, by continuing at least the present duties upon all woollen articles of foreign manufacture imported into the United States.

COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS OF THE CUSTOMS.

[Communicated to the House, March 21, 1816.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
March 21, 1816.

SIR: The petitions hereinafter mentioned have been referred to this Department at different times:

1. The petition of the inspectors of the customs of the port of Philadelphia, praying an increase of their compensation.

2. The petitions of the inspectors and weighers of the customs at New York, with a similar prayer.

3. The petition of the inspectors of the customs at Baltimore, with a similar prayer.

By the act of the 2d of March, 1799, (vol. 4.) the compensation of an inspector was fixed at a sum not exceeding two dollars for every day that he should be actually employed in aid of the customs, to be paid by the collector out of the revenue, and charged to the United States, according to the amount produced, at certain rates, regulated by the quantity, and the kind of the articles measured, weighed, or gauged. It is believed that the compensation of this class of officers has seldom exceeded at any place the average of two dollars for each day; and that, at many places, it falls much below that sum.

It is obvious that the effective value of the compensation, which was allowed in 1799, has been greatly reduced in consequence of the enhanced price of every article of subsistence and comfort. The service of the inspector has, also, become much more severe and important than it was at that period. The compensation of the weighers, measurers, and gaugers, might be considered as increasing with the increase of their business; but, in truth, the effect of the increase of business must be the employment of a greater number of those officers, and, consequently, the compensation of each will probably remain stationary.

Under every view of the subject I am impressed with the justice and policy of granting the prayer of the petitioners, by advancing their present compensation at the rate of fifty per cent.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

HON. WILLIAM LOWNDES.

WASHINGTON, March 8, 1816.

DEAR SIR: Some weeks ago petitions from the weighers and inspectors of the customs, belonging to the port of New York, were presented to Congress, praying for an augmentation of salary. This petition was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, who, I have understood, have laid it before you. I feel impressed with the necessity of granting some relief to the petitioners, and I have, therefore, taken the liberty to address you on the subject.

The officers of the customs in the city of New York are a very reputable class of men, many of them old Revolutionary officers; many of them persons who once were in comfortable, and even elevated circumstances, and who, owing to adverse fortune, have had to take refuge, in advanced life, in the scanty shelter from want that the per diem of a custom-house officer affords; and all of them, as far as my knowledge extends, possess the character of being upright and exemplary. They are remarked for their official integrity: so much so, that I have never heard a lisp of such a thing as corruption having been found among them.

The salary now given them, of two dollars per day, was established about eighteen years ago when it was probably quite sufficient; but everything has so enhanced since that day that one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars will not go as far now as seven hundred and thirty dollars did then. No small tenement, of any decent appearance is to be obtained at present under two hundred and fifty dollars. The fuel to support one fire will cost eighty dollars. A solitary servant eighty more. Here is four hundred and ten dollars of the seven hundred and thirty gone for three items. The fact is, I have ascertained, to my perfect conviction, that these men are in a deplorable situation. Some of them have families of five, six, and I know of one who has nine children. They are perplexed with small debts, contracted through poverty, for the absolute wants of their families, and many of them are becoming shabby in their appearance. I have been told by one that to school his children was out of the question, for he could not afford them shoes in the Winter. Many of them have grown gray in the employ, and most of them have been so long engaged that they have either lost the knowledge of all other business, or have lost the means of helping themselves to a change; and are too necessitous to throw up this "half a loaf" for the uncertain hope of getting into better bread.

I ought to mention, also, that, in consequence of the double duties, there has been a necessity for increase of vigilance; and this has compelled the officers, by the direction of their superiors, to watch by night as well as by day; so that they have, of late, lost two nights' sleep in a week. This has made their duty peculiarly hard. From all these circumstances and facts I cannot refrain from saying that I think equity and common humanity dictate that they should be relieved.

Setting aside their own personal claims, good policy must imperiously require that their situation should be comfortable. These men, thus perplexed and needy, are, indirectly, the collectors of the revenue, which, in New York, under the expected tariff, will amount to nothing short of eight millions of dollars per annum. Ought not the guardians of this amount of impost to be kept decently alive? You must agree with me, sir, that starvation is no great friend of honesty; and the question becomes a serious one, whether, while all the means of life are amply at hand, starving men will not be apt, even at the expense of integrity, to help themselves! Men are best kept honest by not being led into temptation. Should they at once get corrupted, and the frauds that are common all over Europe and elsewhere, become familiar here, it is impossible to calculate the amount of injury the revenue may sustain.

We certainly ought to augment the salaries of these officers at the same moment that we augment the duties. One hundred thousand dollars, and, perhaps, a smaller sum divided annually among the petty officers of the customs, in addition to their present salaries, may be the means of saving one million per annum to the public income. Something of this kind, most unquestionably, must be done; the good of the community at large demands it, and if it be neglected, the alternative is inevitable; either our inspectors of the customs will become dishonest, or quit the employ in order that dishonest men may take their places.

You will pardon the freedom with which I have addressed you, and believe me, with sincere regard, dear sir, &c.,

WM. IRVING.

The Hon. A. J. DALLAS.

SENATE CHAMBER, March 19, 1816.

SIR: Several respectable individuals of New York, whose business gives them a particular knowledge of the duties of the inspectors of the customs, have signified their opinion that an increase of the compensation of these officers was expedient, and that the public interest would be secured and promoted by such increase.

I take the liberty of uniting in this opinion, and of communicating the same to you, on the information that the subject has been referred for your consideration and report.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

RUFUS KING.

A. J. DALLAS, Esq.,
Secretary of the Treasury.

REMISSION OF FORFEITURES.

[Communicated to the House, March 22, 1816.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
March 22, 1816.

SIR: The petition of "sundry merchants of Massachusetts," which was transmitted in your letter of the 21th ultimo, with a request from the Committee of Ways and Means for "any information on the subject of the petition, or any opinion in regard to the claim of the petitioners that it was thought proper to communicate," has been duly considered, in connexion, as well with the documents that accompanied it, as with other documents in this Department upon the same subject, and I have now the honor to communicate the result.

Towards the close of the year 1814 great quantities of goods, of British manufacture, amounting, probably, in the aggregate value, to more than a million of dollars, were admitted to entry at Hampton, in the district of Penobscot, and the duties upon them were paid or secured at the time of the entry. The goods, or a considerable proportion of them, on their way to Boston, from Hampden, were afterwards seized as forfeited, under various laws; some of them were libelled in the district court of Massachusetts, and others in the district court of Maine; and, upon the trial of one of the libels in Massachusetts, with an agreement that the fate of that case should, generally, be binding on all the other cases, the jury gave a verdict in favor of the claimants, under the direction of the court. To that direction, however, a bill of exceptions was tendered, and, upon a writ of error, the judgment of the district court was reversed, and a new trial ordered to be had at the bar of the circuit court.

In this state of the legal proceedings, the petitioners, who are the claimants of the goods, apply to Congress to be relieved from the alleged forfeiture, for the reasons which are assigned in the petition; and, upon the whole, two questions arise for consideration; 1st, whether the claimants are the bona fide owners of the goods, and became so in a lawful manner; 2d, whether the importation and entry of the goods at Hampton were, under all circumstances, lawful. To pave the way for the decision of the committee, on these questions, a more particular statement of the facts, which are involved in the case, becomes proper and necessary.

The general facts of the case.

The British Government having declared, during the late war, a general blockade of the whole coast of the United States, the American Government on — of —, issued a proclamation, protesting against the extravagance of the measure, and offering to neutral traders an assurance of all the protection it could give. Upon the same principle and policy letters were, on particular occasions, written from the Treasury Department to the collectors of the customs, authorizing the protection and encouragement of neutral commerce; and, on the 4th of April, 1814, the non-intercourse laws had been repealed so as to admit, generally, the importation of goods of British growth, produce, or manufacture, and to allow neutral vessels to trade between the United States and Great Britain and Ireland, and the colonies or dependencies of Great Britain. But neither the President's proclamation, nor the Treasury correspondence, nor the repealing act, were designed to sanction a merely colorable neutrality, covering the property of the enemy, involving an unlawful intercourse between the citizens and the enemies of the United States, and violating the positive sanctions of the laws enacted for the security of the public revenue.

On the 1st of September, 1814, a British military and naval force took possession of Castine, the port of entry for the district of Penobscot, and claimed, by proclamations and military orders, the sovereignty and jurisdiction of all the territory east of the bay and river Penobscot. The actual possession and occupancy of the British troops did not extend over the territory claimed; and, in particular, it is to be observed that, although the town of Orrington, which was neither a port of delivery nor of entry, situated on the east side of the Penobscot, was probably once visited, during the month of November, 1814, by a small detachment, "it never had attempted to surrender to the British arms," as Judge Story judicially declared, in delivering the judgment of the circuit court, "and it always continued to assert and claim its American rights and privileges, and to obey the laws of the United States." When the British forces took possession of Castine the collector of Penobscot removed his office to Hampden, (which was a port of delivery for vessels of the United States only, and was not a port of entry for any vessels,) situated on the west side of the Penobscot, nearly opposite to Orrington.

The appearances of an illicit traffic between the inhabitants of the west and the military occupants of the east side of the bay and river Penobscot were soon displayed, and strong representations were made to the Government upon the subject. It was not found practicable, however, in this quarter, any more than at Passamaquoddy, to prevent the intercourse. Supplies were sent in abundance to the enemy; and goods, almost without stint, were imported into the United States from his possession, either clandestinely, or in vessels assuming a neutral flag. The goods claimed by the petitioners were brought from Orrington to Hampden in the latter mode. The petitioners do not, either in the allegations of their petition, or in the documents accompanying it, furnish the means of making a discrimination in the merit of their cases; but, on the contrary, as they all united in an agreement to be bound in the decision of one case, and as they unite in one application to Congress upon the same general statement, it must be presumed that the cases are not susceptible of any important distinction. They will, therefore, be embraced without discrimination, in the narrative of the transaction, which the petition places upon a footing of a fair and open neutral trade; as to the owner and character of the vessel employed; as to the owners of the goods imported, and as to the course of the trade.

1st. As to the owner and the character of the vessel employed.

In delivering the judgment of the circuit court, Judge Story states that the goods claimed by the petitioners "were found at Orrington, in the month of November, 1814, and were then shipped on board of a small sloop, called the Christina, commanded by a Mr. William P. Unger, and transferred to Hampden, where they were admitted to an entry by the collector of the district, as foreign goods imported in a foreign vessel, &c.; that the sloop was American built, and was, until the 14th of October, 1814, enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, in the district of Penobscot, by the name of the Union; that, on that day, she was sold to Mr. Unger, the master, who called himself a Swedish subject, although it was in proof that he had for several years domiciled in the United States; and that, at the time of transporting the goods, the sloop was navigating under a pass from Mr. Soderstrom, the Swedish Consul, dated the 14th of the same October, recognising her as entitled to the benefit of the Swedish flag; but her crew, with the exception of the master, were all Americans."

The character of Unger and the Christiana, thus described by the judge, is also to be traced in the depositions and documents accompanying the petition.

It is stated by Charles Tibbet, the deputy collector of Penobscot, "that he had known the Christina by the name of Union, prior to the arrival at Hampden, for several years; that he did not recollect where she was built, but she was originally an American vessel; that her last owners were Samuel Bartlett and another person, both of Buckstown; that she continued to be their property until October last, at which time, according to a bill of sale, she appeared to have been transferred to Mr. Unger; that he had known Mr. Unger about three months; had heard Unger say he was married; had a wife at the Southward.

Remission of Forfeitures.

&c.; that he did not know where Unger resided for the last three years, but he had heard him say that he had sailed from the Southward and Westward; that Unger occasionally then resided at Hampden; that he was at Castine about the end of September, 1814, where he saw Unger, who told him that he had goods on hand which he wished to introduce into the United States, stating that he was a neutral subject, asking him if he could import the goods in a neutral vessel, and whether such a vessel would be admitted to an entry on application being made; and that he told Unger he thought there would be no difficulty if it were a regular vessel," &c.

It is stated by Samuel Bartlett, (who proves to have been the owner of the Union, on the 14th of October, 1814, the date of the alleged bill of sale to Unger,) that, in the month of October, 1814, Unger informed him that he was a naturalized and Swedish subject, and had, with other neutrals, a large quantity of goods at Castine, then in the possession of the British, which he wished to ship into the United States; and applied to him to go to Hampden, in order to learn, from the collector, whether he felt himself authorized, by the laws of the United States, to enter goods in a neutral vessel with consular papers at Hampden; that he went accordingly, and Mr. Hook, the collector, being absent, Mr. Tibbet, his deputy, informed him that he would enter all goods which came in that way, and thought there would be no kind of difficulty in so doing; that he observed, that he wished Tibbet to be sure he was right, for it was of great importance to his employer; that he returned immediately to Castine, and gave information to Unger of Tibbet's answer, and Unger a few days after sent the sloop Christina to Orrington," &c.

It is stated by Joseph Lee, "that, in the months of November and December, 1814, he was employed by Unger, master and owner of the Swedish sloop Christina, to do the necessary writing, &c.; that he prepared the master's manifests and owner's entry of several cargoes of foreign goods, which were shipped on board of the said sloop at Orrington and Buckstown, and imported into and delivered at Hampden and Frankfort; that he was knowing to Unger's purchasing large quantities of foreign goods of British merchants at St. John's and Halifax, which were transported to Orrington, and imported and delivered at Hampden; and that he verily believed that Unger was, what he said he was, a native of Bohemia, and a naturalized Swede; that John Nyman was a native Swede; and that Constantino Lefrio was a native Spaniard."

It is stated by Edward W. Bradshaw, "that, in the month of November, 1814, while acting as Swedish vice-consul, under the authority of Richard Soderstrom, Esq., he went to Hampden, in the county of Hancock, in the district of Maine, for the purpose of examining the papers of the Swedish sloop Christina, whereof Unger was master and owner; on examination he found her papers to be original ones, and that Captain Unger was entitled to all the privileges of a naturalized citizen of Sweden; that he could not say where he was born, but believed he was born in Denmark, and had a Swedish burgher's brief."

It is stated, generally in the thirteen manifests of the successive cargoes imported in the sloop Christina from Orrington to Hampden and Frankfort, that Peter W. Unger is master and owner of the vessel, and that he is a burgher of St. Bartholomew.

Upon the evidence thus recited, in relation to the owner of the vessel, it appears that, on the 14th of October, 1814, the alleged Swedish sloop Christina, owned by Unger, a naturalized Swede, was the American licensed sloop Union, owned by Samuel Bartlett and another person, citizens of the United States; that Unger (as Judge Story says) had been for several years domiciled in the United States; but that, on the 14th of October, 1814, with a view to the transportation of goods from Orrington to Hampden, the vessel assumed a neutral flag, and Unger obtained a certificate and pass from the Swedish consul, recognising him as a naturalized Swede.

2d.—As to the owners of the goods imported.

It appears from the thirteen manifests which have been already referred to, that all the goods imported in the Christina were entered at Hampden from Orrington, between the 29th of October and the 22d of December, 1814, both days inclusive; that the only shippers of the goods were W. P. Unger, S. J. M. Peillon, John Lyman, and Lefrio, and that the goods were consigned to order, to Unger, to Nyman, to Lefrio, to Herrick, and to Crosby, respectively. The only bill of sale exhibited with the petition, purports to be one from John Nyman to Mr. Arthur Tappan, dated Hampden, the 3d of December, 1814, for goods to the amount of $58,982 70. It is stated that the goods had been bought by Nyman of "James Chapman, on the 13th of November, 1814;" that "the advance was twenty per cent., it being understood that the said Tappan is to pay the duties on the above goods when they become due;" and it concludes with a receipt in these words: "December 5. Received payment, by draft, on John Tappan, of Boston, payable in sixty days from date. John Nyman." The signature to the receipt is the subject of a deposition by Timothy Rogers, who says, "that he has seen the said Nyman write his name, and had no doubt but that the signature of John Nyman to the annexed bill of sale to Anthony Tappan, dated December 3, 1814, &c., is the proper handwriting of the said Nyman, and that the deponent spoke of this fact as from his best recollection, having never seen Nyman write but once."

The real ownership of the great quantity of goods imported, appears, therefore, to be referred, without explanation, by the petitioners to Unger, to Nyman, to Lefrio, and to Peillon.

Of Unger, and his competency to be owner of a great portion of the goods, the facts already stated are all that can be traced.

Of Nyman, and of his competency to be the owner of a great portion of the goods, it is stated by Timothy Rogers, "that John Nyman arrived at Gloucester in May, 1814, master of the schooner Magdalena, and applied to the deponent to enter his vessel, and to transact his business. That the vessel and cargo, from papers, appeared to be the property of Nyman, and the cargo was consigned to the deponent, as his agent or commission merchant. That the deponent followed his instructions in the management and disposal of it; and that he acted, in all respects, as owner, the deponent knowing no one else as owner." The manifest of the Magdalena's cargo is exhibited. It is further stated by John S. Trott, that Nyman is a Swede, a man of integrity and credit in trade; and Mr. Soderstrom, the Consul General of Sweden, as well as Mr. Blagge, the Swedish Consul for Massachusetts, states that Nyman is a Swede.

Of Lefrio, and his competency to be the owner of the goods imported in his name, all that occurs is a statement by Joseph Lee, that Lefrio is a Spaniard, and that it appears by the invoices that he was an owner of some of the goods.

Of Peillon there is no trace in the documents accompanying the petition, except his name occurs in the manifests. Peillon has, however, filed a petition for a remission of the forfeiture incurred, in which he claims a part of the goods in his own right as a neutral Frenchman, and admits that his goods were transported from Castine to Orrington by land, alleging such course to have been necessary, in order to avoid the British blockade.

3d.—As to the course of the trade.

It is sometimes alleged that the goods were purchased in Halifax, and sometimes that they were purchased at Castine; but how or when they were deposited at Orrington, does not appear upon the documents accompanying the petition; nor, indeed, did the fact appear (as Judge Story states) in the evidence before the circuit court.

To these general views of the case it is proper to add that, on the 25th October, 1814, four days previously to the first entry of the Christina at Hampden, a letter was written to Josiah Hook, by John Tappan, agent, and Edmund Munroe, agent, in which they inquire as follows: "We are desirous to ascertain from you if a neutral vessel, with neutral papers, and with a cargo owned by a neutral subject, will be admitted to an entry in the district of Penobscot, say in Hampden or Bangor, if such a one should arrive without a clearance," &c. Mr. Hook answered that "he would admit a vessel to an entry, of the description mentioned, at either Hampden or Bangor, and that he should afford every facility that the law would authorize to encourage fair trade." An application was also made by Mr. Tappan to Mr. Blake, the district attorney, for an opinion on the legality of the course contemplated by the above inquiry. Mr. Blake's answer branches into a number of points, but, in substance, it confirms the opinion given by Mr. Hook.

For whom Messrs. Tappan and Munroe acted as agents, in their application to the collector and district attorney, does not appear. Mr. Tibbet states that "he does not know whether any part of the goods was the property of Mr. Unger, nor does he know to whom the said goods did belong. That the duties were secured, and in part paid by Thomas W. Storow, of Boston, John Crosby, jun., of Hampden, and Hartwell Williams, of Augusta, all of them American citizens. That he does not know by whom the goods were transported to Boston, but that the certificates intended to accompany them were delivered by him to Mr. Storow.

Having thus examined the documents accompanying the petition, without referring, except generally, to the contemporaneous information received at the Treasury Department, it is proper to bring into view the material allegations of the petitioners in point of fact, (not already brought into view by the foregoing statement,) that they may be compared with the evidence. They are the following:

1. That the petitioners were, respectively, purchasers of goods imported into the district of Penobscot, since the 1st of October, 1814, by divers persons, subjects of Powers in amity with the United States, being neutrals, not domiciliated in the United States, nor in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, nor in any of the colonies, provinces, dependencies, or possessions thereof.

2. That, after the repeal of the non-importation and non-intercourse laws, goods were imported by neutrals from British possessions into the district of Passamaquoddy, were admitted to an entry, and there sold to American merchants, without prohibition, seizure, or detention; and, after the capture of Eastport, the custom-house was removed to Lubec, where similar entries and sales were allowed.

3. That the collector of Penobscot, or his deputy, "on application being made by sundry neutral merchants," to ascertain whether goods of British manufacture, but the property of neutrals, could be admitted to entry at Hampden, as well from Castine as from other places in the actual possession of the British, answered in the affirmative; and, in consequence thereof, such importations were made.

4. That thereupon the petitioners purchased, bona fide, a considerable quantity of the goods so imported, after they were entered and landed, at an advance, and paid for them, at the terms of purchase, by drafts and bills on different places abroad, and in the United States.

6. That, on the trial of the libel in the district court, it was admitted on the part of the United States, and of the officer who made the seizure, that, at the time of the importation, the goods were the property of neutral subjects, not domiciled in the United States, nor in any of the British dominions, and were imported in a vessel admitted by the collector to be a neutral vessel.

6. That Orrington was deemed by the collector either a British possession, from which neutrals might trade to the United States, or a place at which the goods might be landed, as in a case of necessity, under the twenty-seventh section of the collection law, (vol. 4,) without incurring the penalties and forfeitures of the act interdicting to neutrals a participation in the coasting trade of the United States.

Upon the whole, the question recurs, 1st. Whether the petitioners are the bona fide owners of the goods claimed, and became so in a lawful manner? And, 2d. Whether the importation and entry of the goods at Hampden were, under all circumstances, lawful?

The consideration of these questions is submitted, respectfully, to the Committee of Ways and Means, upon the following propositions:

1. That if the vessel, master, and other persons employed were, in fact, neutral, and not the instruments of a contrivance, to evade the law of war, as well as the municipal law; and if the goods, when landed and entered at Hampden, were, bona fide, the property of neutrals, and not the property of an enemy, or of citizens having purchased them from the enemy, the first question may be answered in the affirmative. But if there be a doubt upon the subject, the petitioners may be allowed time to produce further evidence before Congress, or they may be referred to the decision on the trial, which has been ordered at the bar of the circuit court.

2. That, if the first question be answered in the affirmative, the legal answer to the second question, arising upon the strict law of the case, may be superseded by an exercise of the legislative authority. It will then be unnecessary to decide upon the lawfulness of establishing a port of entry at Hampden; and upon the lawfulness of the importation and deposit of the goods at Orrington; and upon the unlawfulness of the trade between Hampden and Orrington, upon the waters of the United States, under a neutral flag, and with an unlicensed vessel.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. J. DALLAS.

Hon. WM. LOWNDES,
Chairman Com. Ways and Means.

UNSETTLED BALANCES.

[Communicated to the House, April 24, 1816.]

Mr. HUGER, from the committee appointed by a resolution of the 27th February last, to examine generally into the subject of unsettled balances, submitted the following report:

At an early period after their appointment the committee proceeded to turn their attention to the subject submitted to them. Although prepared to meet many difficulties, in the proposed investigation of unsettled balances, they had by no means anticipated that these difficulties would have been so serious, or to the extent they have experienced. They found themselves advancing into a labyrinth, the intricacies of which increased at every step they progressed. Little versed in the laws under which they were established, and still less in the rules, regulations, and modes of proceeding adopted by the different departments, it became necessary that they should, in the first instance, endeavor to obtain some information on these points; and having no particular clue to guide them in making an investigation, the labor, zeal, and attention they were able to devote to this or that particular object of research not unfrequently turned out to have been unnecessary, or of little or no avail. The want of time, arising from their other official duties, the fast approaching period of the adjournment, and more than all, the measure wisely adopted by the House, of appointing distinct standing committees to examine hereafter into each respective department, have therefore induced the committee to suspend, at least for the present session, any further attempt to investigate the details of particular balances, and rather to confine themselves to a general view of the subject of the causes which have given rise to so many unsettled balances, and of the provisions which presented themselves as likely to remedy, or at least check the evil, and which it might be deemed expedient to submit to the consideration of the House.

It will be recollected that, at its commencement and first establishment under the new Constitution, large and extensive powers and duties devolved upon the General Government, which had been previously vested in the several States. They had, of course, to enter upon a wide and unexplored field of action, and wise and efficient as the regulations and measures adopted for the collection of the revenue in the first instance no doubt were, it was impossible to anticipate all the difficulties or mal-practices which would necessarily arise under an administration of the affairs of this growing country, co-extensive with the Union. Hence, various inconveniences were, in progress of time, experienced, and among others unsettled balances and defalcations in other branches of the public revenue, but more especially among the collectors, and in the customs, began at an early period to be experienced and complained of. Occasional checks and amendments were devised and adopted, as experience showed the necessity of them; but it is believed that there is great room for improvement, and that a general revisal of the organization of the several departments in regard to the management of their fiscal concerns, with additional checks in the collection and expenditures of the public moneys, is most desirable and requisite. On the propriety, therefore, of offering a resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and submit at the next session of Congress some such general and improved system, the committee feel confident that they are supported by the opinion of all those connected or acquainted with the actual state of the several departments.

In the meantime they feel authorized, not only by what has fallen under their own observation, but by the concurrent approbation of all those whom they have consulted, and in particular by that of the Comptroller, and of the Secretary of State himself, to recommend that provision be immediately made for establishing the office of accountant in the Department of State. The business of that, as well as of most other of the departments, has greatly increased within a few years, and is likely to continue to increase. There is, moreover, a great mass of unsettled accounts in the Department of State; nor is it easy to anticipate, under the present organization, when they can be finally acted upon and settled. Its transactions embrace a wide and most extensive field, and it is impossible that the high officer of this branch of the Government, upon whom the whole burden now devolves, can pay the proper and requisite attention to all the little minutiae of the office, and to the increased, increasing, and various pecuniary transactions with agents in every habitable country with which the United States have had, or may have, intercourse or political relations. To all who have attended to the subject the necessity is, indeed, evident; for, having such a subordinate officer, whose immediate duty it will be to bring up the business at this time so much in arrear, to retain precedents, and thereby establish greater system and uniformity in the final adjustment of different accounts, and to bring all those who have transacted or may hereafter transact business, and have accounts with the Department, to frequent and regular settlements. On the other hand, it would seem not less expedient to oblige all foreign Ministers and public agents to send in a regular and semi-annual account current, with the usual and necessary vouchers of all their money transactions with and on account of the Government. This appears to have been heretofore left very much to the individual himself to do or not, as he judged proper; and instances are not wanting of those in high and responsible situations who have never furnished any account whatever of their expenditure, or of the moneys which have passed through their hands. From these considerations, the committee have deemed it incumbent on them to report a bill for the establishment of the office of accountant, and directing regular accounts to be rendered by foreign Ministers and agents, which, if time permit the House to act upon during the present session, it is believed will save the United States many thousand dollars.

With respect to the unsettled balances, (the subject more immediately submitted to their consideration,) which are, by law, annually submitted to the House and published, they may be divided into three separate and distinct classes, viz:

1st. Balances of a doubtful or equitable nature.
2d. Balances on accounts not finally liquidated or acted upon.

3d. Balances liquidated, acted upon, and evidently due to the United States.

The first class includes such of the balances as the departments may not have been able, under existing laws and circumstances, or have felt a difficulty, and perhaps even a delicacy, in acting finally upon. These are not very numerous, but they relate, in several instances, to characters and persons who have held the highest offices under the Government; some of them are, moreover, of long standing, and not likely ever to be finally adjusted under the existing state of things. It appears therefore to the committee, both expedient and desirable that some mode should be adopted for disposing of them, or some tribunal established which might pass them in review, and decide finally upon them, or report them, with their opinions in each respective case, to the House for their further examination and ultimate decision in regard to them.

The second class embraces that description of balances which appears upon accounts, from whatever cause, not finally settled at the several departments. This sometimes happens in cases where further time is allowed for procuring vouchers, or bringing forward additional charges or pretensions to which the individual believes himself, or affects to be entitled. On other occasions unsettled balances are published in obedience to the laws, where the accounts are still in a course of liquidation, and where there is, in fact, no balance actually due, but the balance published as such is what appears to be due at the end of three years on the face of the account, and as far as it has been liquidated. In some instances, it would seem that unliquidated and unsettled balances are published, in cases even where the individual has been ready and prepared to settle finally his accounts, but for want of time, or from doubts in regard to some undecided points, or from some other cause, proceeding not from him, but the Department, a final settlement has not taken place.

The necessary publication of some of these unsettled balances, in the manner pointed out by the existing provisions of the law, is perhaps to be regretted; for, whilst defaulters and those guilty of peculation deserve to be thus published and made known, it tends greatly to diminish the odium and contempt which they would experience, that their names should be coupled to, and appear with, those who are less culpable, or perhaps in nowise defaulters. Nor can it fail to be peculiarly painful and aggravating to the feelings of honest and honorable men to find themselves in such company, and held up to the public under at least the appearance of having committed like frauds upon the Government.

It would seem, indeed, that no account ought to remain unliquidated and unsettled after a lapse of three years. Yet as this may, and has happened, the committee are of opinion that the Comptroller ought to have the discretionary power of distinguishing cases of this kind, as well as those which fall under the first class, from the general mass of unsettled balances, and to present them in a separate and special report, stating the circumstances of each, and the course, where necessary, he would recommend to be pursued in regard to them.

It might, perhaps, be likewise proper to render it a part of the duty of the several departments to keep a regular annual account in the name of each and all of the salary officers, and of any other persons, whose accounts might at all times be satisfactorily stated without recourse to the individual for vouchers. And it seems evidently proper, on the other hand, that each and every person having money transactions with the Government should be bound to render at least semi-annual accounts, and, where possible, to make an annual settlement in full of all receipts and expenditures of public moneys which have passed through their hands, or under their management.

To the third, last, and most important class of unsettled balances, belong those of all real defaulters, who either acknowledge themselves to be such, or are found to be so upon a final settlement of their accounts. It is much to be regretted that this class of defaulters should be so numerous, and in some instances for considerable sums; nor is it less to be regretted that the names are found among them of persons of high standing and consideration in society.

The committee, although for reasons already mentioned they have declined entering into a strict and detailed examination of the accounts of each individual, or bringing any of them forward at the present time, have devoted considerable attention to, and taken into serious consideration, this class of cases, with a view of devising means to lessen the number already existing, and prevent, as far as possible, if not altogether, the recurrence of them in time to come. A hope that the greater experience, and better practical information of the Secretary of the Treasury would enable him to come to their aid in promoting these desirable objects is, likewise, one of their principal inducements for recommending a call upon him to submit a new and revised financial system to Congress at their next session; and, though they are aware that the advanced period of the present session will necessarily prevent any measure on the subject from being brought to maturity at this time, yet the committee deem it not amiss to suggest, for the consideration of the House, the following provisions as likely to contribute, in some degree, to prevent such large defalcations in the future receipts and expenditure of the public revenues as are found on the face of many of the unsettled balances. In this view the committee respectfully propose:

That the Comptroller and Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to review and examine such cases of doubt, equity, or difficulty, in regard to the unsettled balances, as fall under the description of the first or second class specified in this report, and to dispose of them, either by adopting some equitable mode of bringing them to a final settlement, or by specially reporting them, with their opinions in regard to each particular case, to the House, for their further examination and ultimate decision in regard to them.

That the district attorneys, or others, employed on behalf of the United States, be required to make an annual and detailed report to the Comptroller, by him to be laid before Congress, of their proceedings in regard to public defaulters, in their respective districts.

That the Heads of the several Departments be required to specify, in their annual reports to Congress, the names of the persons to whom advances of the public moneys, or with whom contracts have been made, the amount of the sums advanced, and the objects for which they were advanced; also, the names of their sureties, and the amount for which the several sureties are respectively liable.

That all collectors of the customs, and all other receivers of the taxes, duties, or other public moneys whatsoever, be required to pay over weekly, or as frequently as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, to the Bank (or branch bank) of the United States, when established and in operation, or to such other bank in the town or neighborhood in which they reside, as the Secretary of the Treasury may fix on or approve of, all moneys which they may have collected or received; provided, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, their vicinity to such bank, and other circumstances, render it convenient and proper to be done.

That all persons whatever, having pecuniary transactions with the Government, be bound to furnish quarterly, or at least semi-annual accounts, and, where the nature of the case permits, be brought to an annual settlement in full.

That all balances found on settlement to be due the Government, which are not paid up in the course of three months, be forthwith, and without favor or distinction, put into suit; leaving to the Comptroller, however, the authority to make such exceptions to the general rule as he may, in his discretion, deem necessary and expedient; but, in every case where the suit is postponed the Comptroller shall report, at the next session of Congress, the inducements to, and reasons for, such postponement.

That all judgments obtained against defaulters be rigidly enforced, unless otherwise directed by the Comptroller, who shall report, at the ensuing session of Congress, all such cases, and the reasons for granting further indulgence.

That no defaulter, against whom a balance upon settlement of his accounts may be found, be qualified to receive an appointment to any office of trust or profit under the United States, or to obtain any contract from the Government, until such balance be paid up and finally settled.

That the pay and emoluments of all public officers and agents, as far as it can constitutionally be done, be retained and appropriated to the discharge of any balance found upon settlement to be due by them, until such balances be finally paid and satisfied.

The committee further submit, and recommend for the adoption of the House, the bill accompanying this report, to establish the office of Accountant in the Department of State, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be required, and he is hereby directed, to report, at an early period of the next session, whether any, and, if any, what modifications or amendments may be advisable in the present organization of the several Departments, and especially in regard to their pecuniary concerns; and to submit such general plan or revised system for their future regulation and management, as may in his opinion, be likely to promote economy, and responsibility in the receipt and expenditure of the public moneys, despatch in the public business, and the public interest in general.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 9, 1816.

SIR: I am directed by the committee appointed to "examine generally into the subject of unsettled balances due the United States," to communicate for your consideration certain points or matters, concerning which they wish to receive information in detail, and to request that you will return as early and as full an answer, in regard to each of them, as circumstances may permit. The most prominent of these are as follows:

How, and with what checks, are accounts received and settled at the respective Departments?

What are the nature and description of the accounts in particular received from the Department of State, and what are the conditions and regulations governing their settlement?

Are there any defects in the laws establishing the respective Departments, in relation to the mode of adjusting and settling their accounts respectively; and, if there be any such defects, what provisions suggest themselves by way of remedy?

In the settlement of accounts is priority given at pleasure; or, are they taken up in rotation, and according to certain fixed rules?

Is the period, at which ascertained balances are sued, fixed; or, is there any rule, or principle, according to which all unsettled balances are indiscriminately sued; or are suits directed and postponed, at pleasure, by the Comptroller? In the latter case upon what principles are suits upon ascertained balances commenced or deferred?

To what are the large outstanding balances to be principally or generally attributed?

Do any further checks, penalties, or changes in the management of the several Departments suggest themselves as likely to remedy, or at least lessen, the evils complained of, in regard to such numerous and large unsettled balances, or to facilitate and render more speedy and easy the settlement of accounts in all or either of the Departments?

Are the officers receiving salaries, the agents of, and contractors with the Government, obliged by any law or penalty to render in their accounts quarterly, annually, or at any specified period; or do they render them in at pleasure?

Are the same unsettled balances, which appear on the first or any subsequent annual report, continued to be published in each subsequent annual report, unless finally settled?

It has been complained of that officers and other persons, having accounts to settle with the several Departments, are frequently delayed, sometimes detained at the Seat of Government an unreasonable length of time, at an enormous and ruinous expense. If these complaints be not altogether groundless, does this detention arise from the want of clerks, &c.; or does any mode suggest itself, which would secure a greater facility, and an earlier examination and settlement of their accounts to persons so attending at the Seat of Government?

Is there any other mode of recovering balances due the United States than by suit at law, or any penalty attached by law or custom to defaulters? For example: when considerable balances appear due by individuals for three years and upwards, is it customary, or anything like a fixed principle, to suspend them from further public agencies, or to refuse to make further contracts with them?

In general, any information or suggestion which may be deemed useful, or likely to throw light on this subject, either as to the past, or in relation to measures hereafter to be recommended, is requested.

With sentiments of great respect, &c.,

BENJAMIN HUGER, Chairman.

JOS. ANDERSON, Esq.,

Comptroller of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Comptroller's Office, March 14, 1816.

SIR: Your letter, dated the 9th instant, as chairman of the committee appointed to "examine generally into the subject of unsettled balances due the United States," I had the honor to receive upon the 11th, and I take leave to present my answers to your several questions in the order following:

"How, and with what checks, are accounts received and settled at the offices of the respective Departments?"

At the Treasury Department, accounts which exclusively belong thereto are received by the Comptroller, the Auditor, Commissioner of the Land Office, and Commissioner of the Revenue; all of which, except those belonging to the Land Office, are placed in possession of the Auditor, who states them, and examines and reports them to the Comptroller, who revises and finally decides upon them. The accounts received by the Commissioner of the General Land Office are such only as properly appertain to that department of the Treasury; and they are stated and examined by that officer in the manner accounts are stated and examined by the Auditor, and are reported to the Comptroller, who finally decides upon them. When these accounts are thus acted upon by the Comptroller, they are sent to the office of the Register of the Treasury to be recorded, and the accounts remain under the care of the Register of the Treasury. This mode of settlement comprehends all the checks that belong to the whole accounts of the Treasury Department.

Unsettled Balances.

Department of State. The accounts received from the Department of State, by the accounting officers of the Treasury, are those of Ministers, Consuls, special agents, messengers, and generally all such as relate to foreign intercourse, and other pecuniary concerns of that Department. Since the year 1801, the settlement of these accounts, agreeably to an arrangement then made by the Comptroller, has devolved upon the accounting officers of the Treasury, under the direction of the Secretary of State; that is, the Secretary of State states the nature and time of service of the persons employed, the allowance to be made for contingent and other expenses, and, in cases where the law is silent, the compensation to be received. All the requisite information being possessed by the Secretary, he decides on the principles of settlement, and the officers of the Treasury have little more to do than to arrange and give form to the account, to make the necessary calculations, and to see that the party is charged with all advances or payments on account ascertained to have been made to him.

The accounts of the War and Navy Departments are (or should be) rendered by their respective agents, contractors, &c., according to forms and rules prescribed by the accountants of those Departments: when received, they are settled without any immediate check. The sums admitted to the credit of individuals for supplies, services, &c., are entered in the accountants' books to the debit of the general account of expenditure to which they belong; each of these general accounts is closed at the end of the quarter by passing its amount to the debit of the United States, and they, of course, form the debtor side of the quarterly account which the accountant transmits, with all his settlements and vouchers, for revision at the Treasury. If any errors are discovered, the accountant is advised of them, in order that he may make the necessary corrections in his book, and hold the parties accountable. In the revision, thus made, consists nearly all the control which the accounting officers of the Treasury possess over the accounts of those Departments.

It may be proper to observe that, whenever an account is settled by either of the accountants of the War or Navy Department, and a balance is found due from the United States, a warrant is issued by the Secretary of the Department, countersigned by the accountant, and the money received by the party. Many items are admitted in the accounts, under rules, regulations, and ordinances of the Departments, over which the accounting officers of the Treasury do not consider themselves as having any control; and, when it is considered what a length of time must necessarily elapse, in consequence of the immense accumulation of accounts which now have to pass the accounting officers of the Treasury, before any control can be exercised, the effects of its utility must be very limited.

"In the settlement of accounts is priority given at pleasure; or are they taken up in rotation, and according to certain fixed rules?"

At the Treasury there are no fixed rules as to the time of taking up accounts for settlement. They are, however, generally taken up according to the time at which they are rendered; and, if the necessary vouchers accompany them, they are finally acted upon. If vouchers be wanting the party is advised thereof by letter, and the account suspended until the vouchers be supplied; though it is sometimes found necessary to settle the account, as far as the vouchers furnished will enable the accounting officers to do so, and suspend the items, not vouched, until vouchers are supplied.

"Is the period at which ascertained balances are sued, fixed; or is there any rule or principle according to which all unsettled balances are indiscriminately sued; or are suits directed and postponed at pleasure by the Comptroller? In the latter case, upon what principles are suits upon ascertained balances commenced or deferred?"

There is no period fixed at which ascertained balances are sued for; sometimes suits are instituted immediately upon the balance being ascertained, according to what may be the circumstance of the case. In important cases the Secretary of the Treasury is always consulted. In minor cases the Comptroller has heretofore been governed by his sound discretion, which has been regulated by the advice and information of the several district attorneys of the United States within whose district the debtors might reside. This mode has been deemed expedient, because more correct and proper information was to be expected from them than could be had by any other means; but information has been sought and sometimes obtained through other channels, and in many cases we have not been able to find out where the debtor lives; this is one reason why a number of suits have not been brought against defaulters. Suits are sometimes continued upon the special recommendation of the district attorneys, with a view of obtaining better security where the debt is doubtful; and, upon that condition, allowing further time for payment, and upon some occasions where the debt is secure, and the vigorous prosecution of the suit would ruin the party, indulgence is given.

"To what are the large outstanding balances to be generally or principally attributed?"

By a law passed on the 3d day of March, 1809, it is made the duty of the Comptroller to lay an annual statement before Congress of the accounts in the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, which may have remained more than three years unsettled, or on which balances appear to have been due more than three years prior to the 30th of September then last past. In consequence of this law all the balances found due, according to its provisions, were reported, and the names of the persons upon the annual list which have been submitted, have all been retained on the respective reports, the Comptroller not conceiving himself authorized to discontinue the names of any person, except in case where the accounts have been paid, or finally settled, which have been but few. The increase of these annual lists may be attributed to the delays of persons claiming credits, furnishing the necessary vouchers to establish such credits as will be seen in numerous cases remarked on the list of balances; to the tediousness of the legal proceedings, to returns of balances against officers of the Government for moneys advanced, many of whom reside abroad, and whose accounts are unavoidably continued open for more than three years.

It is, however, believed that, in many cases, nothing is really and justly due from those apparent debtors, some of whom were salary officers who have not rendered their accounts, and have been charged with the money they have received upon drafts made on account of salary.

"Are the officers receiving salaries the agents of, and contractors with, the Government, obliged, by any law, or under any penalty, to render in their accounts quarterly, annually, or at any specified period, or do they render them in at pleasure?"

The several laws, which establish the salaries of the officers of Government, authorized the compensation to be paid at the Treasury of the United States in quarterly payments; and although there is no positive law which obliges any salary officer to render his account quarterly, or at any particular period, the law, making the salary payable quarterly, implies that the account ought to be rendered accordingly, and this, I learn, has been the constant understanding at the Treasury since its organization. The salary officers at the Seat of Government render accounts quarter yearly for themselves, and the agents of salary officers render quarterly accounts for them. On the adjustment of which accounts, by the accounting officers of the Treasury, the amount found due is passed to the credit of the party, and a warrant is drawn on the Treasurer of the United States, and the warrant itself is debited to the officer in whose favor it was issued.

Officers who have an annual salary, and, in addition thereto, receive fees, perquisites, and emoluments, render their salary accounts quarterly with their accounts of fees, perquisites, emoluments, and expenditures; collectors of the customs quarterly, under a penalty of $1,000, to be recovered by suit; and collectors, naval officers, and surveyors, render their accounts of emoluments and expenditures annually under a penalty of $500. Collectors of direct taxes and internal duties render their accounts quarterly under the forfeiture of their official bond, and judgment to be entered thereon at the return term, on motion in open court by the attorney. From the recent establishment of the internal duties no penalty has yet occurred. The Receivers of Public Moneys, on the sale of lands, are required, by law, to render their accounts quarterly.

The agents of the United States render their accounts quarterly, such as agents of the marine hospitals, for the payments of invalid pensioners, light-houses, &c.

The contractors with Government render their accounts agreeably to the time and terms specified in their respective contracts, or according to the rules and regulations which may be established in the different offices where the contracts are made.

"It has been complained of that officers and other persons having accounts to settle with the several Departments are frequently delayed, and sometimes detained at the Seat of Government an unreasonable length of time at an enormous and ruinous expense. If these complaints be not altogether groundless, does this detention arise from the want of clerks, &c., or does any mode suggest itself which would secure a greater facility and an earlier examination and settlement of their accounts to persons so attending at the Seat of Government?"

I am warranted in stating that, as a general rule, no officer nor other person, having accounts to settle at the Treasury Department, who have personally attended, with proper vouchers, have been detained longer than was absolutely necessary for their accounts to be fairly examined, and pass the usual forms of settlement.

The accounts of the principal assessors have not been acted upon as promptly as other accounts. The several laws establishing the internal revenue, and the instructions given by the Secretary of the Treasury upon these laws, have both been so differently construed by the respective principal assessors, and their accounts differing considerably from the view entertained at this office of the allowance to which they are entitled, that more than usual time is required to examine them, and compare the several changes and respective statements which have been made, with the laws and instructions under which they acted. A number of these accounts have also been necessarily suspended for want of proper vouchers, the assessors advised thereof, and the defects stated according to the established practice of the office.

The accounts of the General Land Office are greatly in arrears; some of them remain unsettled from seven to ten years. These accounts are intricate, and generally very large; from ten to fifteen days is required for the best accounting clerks to examine one of them.

Additional clerks have been asked for by several of the Departments, as will be seen in the estimate which was presented to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Is there any other mode of recovering balances due the United States than by suit at law, or any penalty attached by law or custom to defaulters? For example, when considerable balances appear due by individuals for three years and upwards, is it customary, or anything like a fixed principle, to suspend them from further public agencies, or to refuse to make further contracts with them until the old balances are settled up?"

The general mode is by suit; but summary process is authorized in the cases of collectors of direct tax and internal duties. The Comptroller of the Treasury is authorized, by law, immediately upon a delinquency happening in this case, to issue a warrant of distress against the delinquent collector and his sureties. When a public agent becomes a real defaulter, or where it appears that he is likely to become so to any considerable amount, the practice has been to remove him. Contracts are seldom or never made with defaulters who have old balances against them. I know of no law, however, upon this subject.

"Are there any defects in the laws establishing the respective Departments, and do any further checks, penalties, or changes in the management of the several Departments, suggest themselves as likely to remedy, or at least lessen the evils complained of in regard to such numerous and large unsettled balances, or to facilitate and render more speedy and easy the settlement of accounts in all or either of the Departments?"

The several questions here propounded embrace so extensive a field that I cannot, within the short time allowed by the call of the committee, answer them satisfactorily.

The honorable committee well know that, at the time the present system of accounting was formed, the revenue arising from the customs was very limited; there were no internal taxes.

The Military Establishment was very small, and there was not then any Navy Department or General Land Office, and the Post Office accounts were comparatively few, and, of course, the accounts which had to pass the accounting officers of the Treasury were but few, and these small, in comparison with those which now have to pass the form of revision. I, therefore, conceive, from the immense increase of the business of the several Departments, that a considerable modification, and some extension of the present system of accounting would be required to facilitate the settlement of accounts, and to render the necessary checks in the several Departments more prompt and efficient.

To present a view commensurate to the object which appears to be contemplated by the committee, would require time and deliberation.

The Comptroller, therefore, respectfully suggests to the committee, whether their views could not be better attained by requiring some officer of the Government to prepare a report upon this subject, to be laid before Congress at an early day of their next session.

I am, with great respect, &c.

JOSEPH ANDERSON.

COMPENSATION TO MINISTERS AND CONSULS.

[Communicated to the House, April 15, 1816.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 5, 1816.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 28th of March, with a copy of a resolution of the House of Representatives, instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of increasing the annual allowance to the Ministers of the United States in foreign countries, and of allowing salaries to the Consuls of the United States in foreign ports, and requesting such information or opinion on the subject as I may be able to communicate.

Considering it my duty to communicate all the information in the possession of the Department, or within its reach, on any public subject before the House, which may be desired by the committee, I have to add that, in performing that duty, I shall always be happy to give, without reserve, such opinion as I may have formed on the subject.

On the first part of the resolution, relating to the expediency of increasing the compensation of our Ministers in foreign countries, there is but one opinion among all those who have had the best opportunities of acquiring correct information, which is, that the present allowance is altogether inadequate. In this opinion, especially in respect to the principal Courts, I fully concur. Representations to this effect having been made by several of our Ministers, I annex a copy of their communications on the subject; well satisfied I am that great losses have been sustained by those who remained any considerable time abroad.

The members of the diplomatic corps at the several Courts of Europe live much in the same style. Their household establishment, equipage, number of their servants, expenses in attending Court, of intercourse with each other, and of hospitality, are, in the most material circumstances, similar. The habits and propensities of particular members of the corps may increase these expenses considerably; but no degree of economy can reduce them below a certain grade. From the nature of our Government, something may be spared to our Ministers in what regards style or mere ostentatious display, but in nothing else. All the other heavy items are as applicable to them as to the Ministers of other Powers.

Presuming that a view of the compensation allowed by the Powers of Europe to their representatives at foreign Courts may serve to give an idea of the expense of living there in that character, I have annexed a statement of it, as far as it has come within my knowledge.

Having stated the facts which are essential in this case, it is not necessary, and might be improper, for me to communicate any opinion as to the degree of augmentation which ought to be made to the salaries of our Ministers in foreign countries. With a knowledge of the facts, every member of the committee is as competent to judge of the proper augmentation as I can be. The United States constitute a distinguished member of the great community of nations. Their citizens, favored by many important circumstances, particularly by the great excellence of their Government, enjoy in the highest degree all the blessings which can be derived from the social compact. It is our duty to perpetuate these blessings, and, with that view, to fortify ourselves at every point where danger of any kind menaces. Is it necessary that the United States should be represented with foreign Powers? That has long ceased to be a question. Shall they maintain a proper station there, not assuming, but dignified, such as the general expectation and common opinion of mankind have given them? That has never been a question. The character of the country, if not its rank, is in some degree affected by that which is maintained by its Ministers abroad. Their utility in all the great objects of their mission is essentially dependent on it. A Minister can be useful only by filling his place with credit in the diplomatic corps, and in the corresponding circle of society in the country in which he resides, which is the best in every country. By taking the proper ground, if he possesses the necessary qualifications, and is furnished with adequate means, he will become acquainted with all that passes, and from the highest and most authentic sources. Inspiring confidence by reposing it in those who deserve it, and by an honorable deportment in other respects, he will have much influence, especially in what relates to his own country. Deprive him of the necessary means to sustain this ground, separate him from the circle to which he belongs, and he is reduced to a cipher. He may collect intelligence from adventurers and spies, but it will be of comparatively little value; and, in other respects, he had as well not be there.

On the other part of the resolution—the propriety of allowing salaries to our Consuls in foreign ports—I have to state that it is deemed advisable to make such allowance, limited, in the commencement, to certain countries, and to the metropolis of each. On several of the Governments of Europe our citizens have claims to a considerable amount still to settle. In many of the ports of each Power we have, almost at all times, destitute seamen, discharged either from our own merchant vessels, or from those of other nations into which they had entered. Neither of these interests will be duly attended to without a special agent, with an adequate compensation. A Consul is the fittest person to perform these duties; and, under the superintendence of the Minister, whose business is to settle principles, he may with propriety be charged with them. Our citizens have claims on Great Britain, France, Spain, Denmark, the Netherlands, Sweden, and Naples; and we have often destitute seamen in the ports of most of those countries, especially Great Britain. These duties must be executed with some department of their respective Governments near which our agents must reside. It is therefore proposed to allow salaries at this time to our Consuls at London, Paris, Madrid, Amsterdam, Copenhagen, and Stockholm, at which places the fees of office and profits of trade do not afford them a support. As special reasons operate in favor of the allowance to these places, it is thought advisable to confine it to them, without deciding, at this time, on the policy of a general change of the system. That turns on other considerations, many of which are suggested in Mr. Crawford's letter. The duties which it is proposed to vest in these Consuls being of a general nature, and, in regard to seamen, coextensive with the European dominions of each Power, it may be useful to give to their consular functions a corresponding extent. Such an extension of the consular authority in an agent residing at the metropolis of the country to which he is appointed, and paid by his Government, would, it is presumed, be found advantageous to our commerce. It would certainly make them more adequate to the other duties which it is proposed to assign them. It may likewise be observed, in favor of the proposed allowance, that the experiment on this scale would afford useful light as to the policy of a general change of the system, when that subject is entered on.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

It is understood that the salaries allowed by the Emperors of Russia and Austria, and by the King of Spain, are of the same grade; and that those of Prussia, Denmark, Sweden, and Holland, though lower than are given by the principal Powers, are higher than those given by the United States. WASHINGTON, April 5, 1816.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3d instant, enclosing the resolution of the House of Representatives, instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of increasing the annual allowance of Ministers of the United States at foreign Courts, and allowing annual salaries to the Consuls of the United States at foreign ports. In reply to your request for the communication of such information on that subject as my late residence abroad will enable me to furnish, I have the honor to state that, from my own experience, I am convinced that a considerable increase to the present allowance to our Ministers at London and Paris is highly expedient. From every circumstance which has come to my knowledge, the Court of St. Petersburg ought to be embraced by the proposed measure. The enclosed extract of a letter from Mr. Erving will show the propriety of extending the measure to the Court of Spain.

Annexed is a statement of the salaries of foreign Ministers at the different Courts of Europe as far as they have come within my knowledge.

The propriety of allowing annual salaries to the Consuls of the United States presents a question of more difficult solution. At present, the inducement to seek the appointment of Consul is the advantage which it confers in the prosecution of foreign trade. American Consuls are generally able to enter into partnership with the most respectable mercantile houses in the ports where they reside, without bringing anything into the firm except those advantages. It is manifest, therefore, that the strongest temptation will be presented to render their official acts subservient to the commercial interests of their foreign partners. It is more than probable that many of the abuses which were known to exist during the late European war, in relation to American papers, and which were seized as the pretext for the unprincipled spoliations committed by the belligerents upon American commerce, originated from this source. This view of the subject presents some inducement to allow American Consuls annual salaries, and for prohibiting them from all participation in trade. But the salary must be considerable, or it will be no equivalent for the restriction which ought to be imposed upon them. The commerce of the United States is now prosecuted in almost every part of the world. The number of Consuls necessary for the protection of this commerce would, with competent salaries, involve a very great annual expense. To allow salaries to none but the Consuls of the capitals of each maritime State would not remove the evil, because, in many cases, the capital is not the principal trading city of the country; and even where it is, there are, in every case, other trading cities in the same State where abuses may be committed to the same extent. To reduce the number of Consuls, and to compel vessels, whether American or foreign, to have their papers authenticated by them, in order to obtain admittance into an American port, would present a temptation to foreign nations to make the same regulation with regard to American ports, which might give to the ports of one State an advantage over those of another; but this regulation would be no radical remedy of the evil intended to be removed. The prosecution of commerce under surreptitious papers is carried on most securely in ports which are not much frequented. It is generally carried on between the ports of foreign States, and not between foreign ports and those of the United States. These abuses will occur more extensively in time of European wars than in peace, and will not fail to produce great embarrassments to the fair and legitimate commerce of the United States.

There is, however, some reason to believe that the appointment of a Consul General to each of the principal commercial States, with a competent salary, invested with power to superintend the conduct of the other Consuls, and to make general regulations for their Government, subject to the sanction of the President, might be found beneficial. Residing at the capital, and carrying on an active correspondence with the different ports of the country, abuses would be more likely to be discovered and corrected than at present. If it shall be deemed expedient to give them annual salaries, a fund might be created by levying a small tonnage duty upon all American vessels which enter foreign ports. Where the duty collected in a port exceeds the salary, the surplus might be paid over to another Consul in the same State, where there was a deficiency.

This mode of compensation might be adopted, whether salaries are allowed or not; and there is but little doubt that it would be received as an equivalent for the right of carrying on trade. In this case, a minimum ought to be fixed. The surplus might be applied in aid of those whose emoluments were the most below that maximum.

I have the honor to be, &c.

"The raising" of the salary there [St. Petersburg.] would, I presume, be very proper, whoever might go; the including London and Paris in this liberal arrangement may also be proper; but why do they exclude Madrid? It is true that nobody has made any noise about the dearth of living at Madrid, for nobody has been there for ten years but myself, and, before my time, raising salaries was never contemplated as possible. In a great many points of view, Madrid may be considered as the most important mission; it is at this time the most difficult and laborious, and has the greatest and most delicate responsibility belonging to it; ought it in that view to be placed on a footing with Holland, Naples, Sweden, and Brazil? As to expense, I would undertake to prove that it is at least twenty-five per cent. dearer than London or Paris. The causes of this difference are evident; almost everything of superior excellence must be brought from France or England; no one attempts to live upon what is to be found in Spain; from the nature of society there, the corps diplomatique is necessarily crowded in upon itself; it makes its own society. This occasions a perpetual round of diplomatic dinners and entertainments, which are not to be avoided; for the same reason, all foreigners of distinction who arrive there are in some sort, as at Constantinople, dependent upon their Ministers for society; they are regularly introduced to such member of the corps diplomatique, and must be as regularly invited, &c. These, to say nothing of the change of residence, augment the expenses of a Minister terribly; in fine, he cannot retire—he must be always in evidence; and the more splendid, because he has to compete as it were with the grandees. Add to all these solid considerations, that it is a place, in every view, of mal-aisé, and, as I have found it heretofore, it may be again a post of personal danger. I do not write to the Secretary of State or the President on this matter, because I have made a general rule of never pressing upon them money considerations.

From the Hon. H. Clay to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, April, 5, 1816.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3d instant.

During my residence in Europe, my place of abode was so frequently changed, and it having been, moreover, principally at provincial towns, that I am not able to furnish much information on the subject of your letter, derived from my own personal experience. I was in London rather more than three months, and, expensive as I had previously understood that city to be, I found it in that respect greatly exceeding all my anticipations: and yet I kept no house, and was certainly not extravagant in my personal expenses.

My opinion of the style in which an American Minister ought to live is, that avoiding the meanness which provokes ridicule, and the ostentation which challenges observation, it should be one of neat simplicity, regulated by the habits of society in the country where he resides, and admitting of the return of civilities and the dispensation to our respectable countrymen of expected hospitality. I believe the present salary wholly inadequate to sustain the expenses of such a style of living at most, if not all, the foreign Courts at which we have Ministers.

I can communicate to you no information of the salaries allowed by other Powers to their Ministers at foreign Courts, nor as to the propriety of allowing salaries to our Consuls.

I am, sir, with great respect, &c.

H. CLAY.

The Hon. JAMES MONROE.

Extract of a letter from Mr Barlow to the Secretary of State, dated PARIS, Nov. 21, 1811.

I need not tell you how necessary it is to raise the salary if you do not mean either to ruin your Minister or injure your affairs. A man in this situation must either spend double his salary, or keep himself excluded entirely from society and from his duty. I naturally and habitually love simplicity, and have an aversion to luxury; but my duty requires that, in this respect, I should give up my own taste. I am determined, while I stay, to do my duty; and, to do this, I must spend at least fifteen (probably eighteen) thousand dollars a year. In this way I cannot stand it long, and you cannot expect to find many men in our country who are at once willing and able to do it, and who are fit for the place.

Pardon the frankness with which I speak on a subject on which I may appear more selfish than I really am, for I feel myself impelled to it by a sense of duty, and I am not without hopes that you will likewise feel it a part of your duty to use your influence to set this matter right.

LONDON, July 31, 1815.

It is needless to say to you, or to any person having been in the same capacity here, that the annual salary of an American Minister is insufficient to support a man with a family—I say not in the style of high official rank, but in the decency becoming a private gentleman.

An experience of the expense of living here for upwards of four months even under all the privations to which I have submitted, has confirmed me in the desire to be recalled as early in the Spring as the President may find it convenient to replace me, if, upon the construction of the law, the Legislature should refuse an appropriation for the outfit.

It is very desirable that some general revision of the consular establishments should be made, and some regular system concerning them be sanctioned by law. For the port of London a provision for the compensation of the Consul must be made, or the office must be given to some wealthy merchant established in the city, to whom it may be acceptable for the facilities of business which he may derive from it. Colonel Aspinwall cannot hold it long without a salary, or without a commercial establishment connected with it, and upon which alone he must rely for support.

In one of his late letters to me, (a copy of which has been transmitted to you,) Mr. Beasley expresses the conviction that the provision made by the laws of the United States for the relief of indigent and destitute seamen in foreign ports is liable to great abuse. The late and present excessive numbers of persons claiming the benefit of it, both at London and Liverpool, afford confirmations of that opinion; but, on the other hand, it is obvious that, with the increase of our commerce and navigation, the casualties incident to them must have proportionably multiplied. The opportunities and the chances of imposition must also be much greater, and require more caution to be guarded against in England than in any other country; and I believe it will be uniformly found, in a time of general European peace, that the duty of affording relief to the objects of this class really entitled to it, and that of discriminating between them and the impostors who would prey upon the fund allotted to this honorable purpose, will be the most arduous and important obligation of an American Consul. * * * Mr. Bourne, the Consul at Amsterdam, has also lately written to me on the same subject, and complains of similar charges. His claims for particular compensation to himself for his long services there, have been often made known to the Government.

The direct commerce between the United States and the port of London is comparatively small. The number of American vessels which come to it is inconsiderable. The official emoluments from year's end to year's end will not pay office rent and the wages of a single clerk. If the support and and reconveyance to the United States of destitute seamen be made the duty of the Consul, some provision for the payment of the necessary expenses of this service must be made.

MILITIA CLAIMS.

[Communicated to the House, March 12, 1816.]

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 7, 1816.

SIR: In obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st ultimo, I have the honor to transmit the enclosed documents.

In addition to the sum advanced to the State of Virginia by the Paymaster General, the sum of four hundred thousand dollars has been paid to that State, for expenses incurred by the employment of the militia in its defence. The claims of that State have been admitted on the ground that the Governor of Virginia was invested with discretionary power, by the War Department, to call forth the militia in such numbers as the emergency should require, and that the force actually employed was, at that time, not believed by the Secretary of War to be excessive. It is now believed that the number of militia kept in service, when compared with that called into the field by the President for the defence of Baltimore, against the same hostile force, which could be brought to act against the capital of Virginia from various points, was not beyond what the emergency required. The force here referred to, and the expense intended to be sanctioned, are those which the letter of the Commissioners, and the statement of the Adjutant General of that State, herewith enclosed, exhibit. The claims of North Carolina and Rhode Island have been sanctioned, because they are founded upon expenses actually incurred upon militia called out under the authority of the United States, or had received the sanction of that authority after they were called into service. The claims exhibited by Delaware and New Hampshire have been suspended until evidence shall be produced to show that the emergency was such as to require the service without waiting the intervention of the Executive authority of the Union.

The State of New York has exhibited claims for arms and ammunition furnished the militia, or captured by the enemy in our military depots; and also for additional pay allowed their militia when in the public service. The claims of Virginia embrace items of the former, and that of New Hampshire of the latter character. No decision has been made upon these claims; but it is believed that the powers of the Department do not extend to their liquidation and admission, without further legal provision for that purpose.

It is believed that no other State has presented any specific claim for money expended upon militia service during the war; but it is proper to state, that in the correspondence between the Governor of Massachusetts and the Secretary of War, it was distinctly declared, that reimbursement would not be made of any expenses incurred upon militia called into service by State authority, with the declared intention of excluding the authority of the United States over such militia force.

Time and reflection, so far from having changed the opinion then formed, have tended only to strengthen and confirm it. The several States have a right, in time of war, to raise and maintain regular troops: more strongly have they the right to employ their militia in military operations, where it can be done without infringing the rights of the National Executive over the same force. But it never can be admitted, that expenses incurred by raising and supporting regular troops can be a charge against the nation; and it is equally clear, that expenses incurred upon militia service, under State authority, with the declared intention of directing and controlling that force to the exclusion of the authority, can form no such charge. No claims of this nature will be recognised by the Executive branch of the Government, unless provision shall be made by law for that purpose.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient, and very humble servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Hon. HENRY CLAY, Speaker.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
Accountant's Office, Feb. 29, 1816.

SIR: I have the honor to state, in relation to the resolution of the honorable the House of Representatives directing the Secretary of War to lay before the House,

1st. A statement of the expenses incurred for the services of the militia called forth by authority of the United States during the late war.

2d. Statement of the accounts which have been exhibited, and claims which have been made, by the respective States for services rendered by the militia of said States, when called forth with or without such authority, together with the sums which have been paid, and the accounts and claims which have been allowed therefor, and in case the claims of any State or States have been rejected or allowed, to state the grounds of such rejection or allowance, designating for what services, and to what States respectively such sums have been paid, or accounts allowed, and designating also such items of claims as have been rejected in the cases where the calls were made by authority of the United States, and the grounds of such rejection.

That, in regard to the first clause of the resolution, the accounts of expenditures during the war have not been kept in a manner to designate what amount has been expended for militia, distinct from the regular army. According to the directions contained in the act of the 3d March, 1809, "further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," accounts of expenditures are kept, under each specific appropriation made for militia, after the year 1812; the whole expenses of the Military Establishment, including militia, having been included in the same appropriation, the expenditures have been made, and the accounts kept correspondently with the appropriations.

As it regards the other sections of the resolutions, I have to state that claims have been exhibited to this office by the States of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and North Carolina, Delaware and New Hampshire.

The amount claimed by the State of Virginia is $1,029,319 95.

The amount claimed by the State of Pennsylvania is $268,556 82.

The amount claimed by the State of North Carolina is $56,513 20½.

The amount claimed by the State of Delaware is $30,619 79.

The amount claimed by the State of New Hampshire is $64,552 20.

These claims have not yet been acted upon definitively in this office, that part which relates to services referring itself in the first instance to the Paymaster of the Army, whose duty it is to discharge all claims in relation to the pay of the militia, and thereafter report them to this office, which has not yet taken place. What portion of these claims have been sanctioned by proper authority can only be ascertained on settlement.

It is not recollected that any claims of the respective States have been presented at this office, which have been rejected or allowed, and consequently no information can be furnished by me, in relation to that part of the resolution.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

TOBIAS LEAR.

The Hon. W. H. CRAWFORD.

ARMY PAY OFFICE,
Washington City, Feb. 27, 1816.

The Paymaster of the Army, to whom has been referred the resolution passed in the House of Representatives on the 21st ultimo, has the honor to report:

That sufficient data to enable him to ascertain, with a due degree of precision, the amount of "expenses incurred for the services of the militia called forth, by authority of the United States, during the late war," are not within his reach.

That from the immethodical manner in which the services have, on some occasions, been performed, many claims doubtless exist that have not yet made their appearance in a specific form; some detachments have been called into service and discharged therefrom without ever having been mustered, whilst the muster-rolls of others are so very imperfect as to render it utterly impossible to act on them and make payments.

That many claims are paid, the accounts of which have, in company with those of the regular army, been rendered to this office, and are in a due course of examination and final settlement; but, from their great magnitude, and from the laborious task this office necessarily has to perform, more time and more labor will be required to get through with the whole.

The many claims, to a vast amount, are now in actual train of adjustment and payment, throughout the whole country, from appropriations made during the present session of Congress.

That the manner in which the appropriations have, for a few years past, been made by Congress, did not require a separate and distinct account of expenditures upon militia to be kept from those of the regular army; and indeed, if it had been required, the nature of the service,

It is to be understood that the foregoing statement relates to such services of militia only, as have been performed in virtue of orders issued by the Executive of the United States, or being performed without those orders, have been recognised by that authority, and payments sanctioned accordingly.

That so far as relates to expenditures by States themselves upon their own militia, independent of the sanction or authority of the General Government, the Paymaster of the Army is in possession of no official information. It is true, however, that two claims partly of this character have, not long since, been presented here, and advances, by special direction of the honorable the Secretary of War, have been made by me upon them: one to the State of Virginia, of two hundred thousand dollars, and another to the State of Rhode Island, of not quite twenty-two thousand dollars; but then these services were, as I understood, recognised by the United States, so that they partook but in part of the nature of those alluded to, namely, that they have been paid from the funds of those States, respectively, which, when the services were thus recognised, the United States were bound to reimburse.

Respectfully,

HON. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD,
Secretary of War,

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 14, 1815.

SIR: This note has been delayed by the expectation of some explanatory documents from Richmond. We have now the honor of submitting to you the grounds on which we expect the President's sanction to the calls of militia which were made by the Governor of Virginia for the defence of Richmond in August and September, 1814; being the only calls, as we understand, of the propriety of which a doubt is entertained, in the Department of War.

It is to be remembered that Richmond is assailable by the channels both of York and James rivers, within eight and forty hours after the enemy's squadron shall have entered our Capes. Arnold, during the Revolutionary war, had that city in flames, within twenty-four hours after the first notice of his approach. Hence the utter impracticability of announcing the approach to the President, and receiving his instructions in time to call forth the militia to an effectual defence. The enemy could have entered Richmond before an express could return from Washington. Hence it is obvious, that against a maritime enemy, like Great Britain, a place so situated is defensible in only one or two modes, either by keeping a standing force before it, equal to any force which the enemy could lead to the assault, or by vesting the Executive of the State with the discretionary power of calling forth the militia in such numbers as to meet the particular emergency, whatsoever it might be. The latter course was adopted by the President of the United States in relation to Richmond. We do not say that any instruction to this effect was given to the Governor of Virginia previously to the calls in the month of August; but the letters of the Secretary of War to the Governor of Virginia immediately thereafter, and indeed almost contemporaneously, do, in the most explicit manner, ratify that course of action; and a subsequent ratification, we understand, is equal to a prior command. Thus, in the Secretary's letter of the 31st of August, (herewith, numbered 1,) written after the destruction of Washington, he announces the descent of the enemy's barges down the Patuxent, and the reason given for the communication is, because it might have a bearing on the Governor's arrangements for his section of the country; but what those arrangements were to be, instead of being defined, is left exclusively to the discretion of the Governor. The same gentleman, in his letter of the next day, (September 1, No. 2,) apprizes the Governor that Richmond was known to be one of the enemy's objects, and closes his letter with these emphatic words: "Be on your guard, prepared at every point, and in all circumstances, to repel the invaders." In what light is it possible to construe these words, but as a clear and explicit recognition of the principle that the General Government placed the defence of the State of Virginia and its metropolis at the discretion of its Governor? The letter, of which we have just quoted an extract, was followed by the President's proclamation of the 3d of September, calling, in terms which no American bosom could resist, upon all officers, civil and military, and upon the nation, to rise to arms, and exterminate the ferocious and sanguinary invaders.

The effect of such a proclamation on such a State as Virginia will be easily conceived by you, sir, when you come to re-peruse the terms of the proclamation and bear in mind the character of the State which you so well know. The shock was electric and universal. The commonwealth rose en masse. Her mountains, fields, and forests, poured forth their armed multitudes, who rushed from all directions to surround and cover their metropolis from British outrage and pollution, and chastise the insolence which had just triumphed over Washington. It was, no doubt, the presence of this numerous concourse at Richmond, or upon their march to it from the country, which has produced the impression that the Governor had made an indiscreet use of the power of defence with which he was intrusted. But this is not the fact. The concourse of which we have spoken forms no part of the charge which we now have against the United States. They were not kept in arms. Their services were not accepted. It was, indeed, with infinite difficulty, and infinite address on the part of the Governor, and with the most painful reluctance, and even tears of regret on theirs, that the generous impulse which had brought them together could be so far repressed as that they could be prevailed upon to return to their homes, and trust the defence and honor of the State to the troops which the Governor had already embodied. But they did return; the sense of duty and order, which forms a no less honorable part of their character than their ardor of patriotism, prevailing over every consideration of personal feeling.

The next direction which the Governor received from the Department of War, was the Secretary's letter, herewith, (No. 3.) of the 6th of September, announcing that the enemy had received a reinforcement at the mouth of Patuxent, that the united squadrons were descending the bay, that Richmond was one of their objects, and repeating again the solemn injunction, "be prepared to meet the enemy." Thus, in every instance, the Governor of Virginia is thrown by the General Government upon his own energies and own judgment, without any notification of the enemy's strength, or the quantum of resistance which it would be expedient for him to call into the field.

To meet the advance guard, as it may be called, of the same enemy, the President of the United States, acting with the advice of his council, had made a call in the month of June or July, unless we are misinformed, of fifteen thousand men. To meet the united squadrons at Baltimore, we are advised that from eighteen to twenty thousand men were called to the defence of that place. To meet the same enemy, at the same crisis, the Governor of Virginia had never in the field more than between eleven and twelve thousand men.

We hand you, herewith, the several general orders calling out troops on the occasion of the first approach of the enemy within our Capes, as also after the fall of Washington, numbered 4, 5, and 6, and submit it with confidence to your judgment, whether these calls can be considered as indiscreet. Whether you take the standard of the call for Washington, or that for Baltimore; or consider the accessibility of Richmond, by the channels either of York or James river, and the consequent necessity of guarding, with equal strength, both those avenues of approach—of guarding them, too, with raw militia against veteran and highly disciplined troops, inured to victory;—it seems very clear that those calls, if censurable at all, are rather censurable for their moderation than their excess.

To these documents, we will add only a letter from the Secretary of War, of the 21st September, written with a full knowledge of all our preparations, and when they were at the highest; in which letter, so far is he from censuring the magnitude of those preparations, that he is considered thereby as having approved and sanctioned them. If this construction be right, there will be no occasion, we trust, of giving you any further trouble on this branch of the claims of Virginia for reimbursement.

We are, sir, very respectfully, &c.

WILLIAM WIRT,
JOHN CHEW.

Hon. WM. H. CRAWFORD,
Secretary of War.

It is difficult to ascertain the number of the troops on any given day previous to the 15th of September. Many of them were discharged immediately upon their arrival, and before they were organized upon any regular plan, or reports could be received from them. This was particularly the case with the cavalry. Of this species of force it was found that the Governor's proclamation and the general orders of the 26th of August had brought into the field a larger proportion than was necessary; consequently, on the 12th of September, seventeen troops were discharged, of which eight were volunteers, and the residue draughts.

Captain Prosser's troop of cavalry was called into service on the 26th August, and performed vidette duty between Richmond and Washington City until the 10th of September, when it was discharged.

Colonel Boykin took the field on the 29th of August, with about eight hundred men, and continued in service until the 13th September. He was stationed at Cabin point, on James river.

The foregoing statement and remarks relate to the measures adopted by the Executive of Virginia for the defence of Richmond, Petersburg, and the shores of York and James river, together with such points of our maritime frontier as could be protected by that force; due regard being had to the safety of the Metropolis.

The situation of the other exposed parts of Virginia will be seen by an examination of the letters from the commanding officers in those parts.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Aug. 31, 1814.

SIR: We have this moment received information, the correctness of which is not doubted, that the enemy evacuated Nottingham yesterday, at 10 o'clock. The barges moved down about 4 o'clock. It is believed that they embarked from Benedict last evening and this morning. I give this notice for your information as early as possible, as it may have a bearing on your arrangements for the defence of your section of the country.

I have the honor to be your Excellency's most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Sept. 1, 1814.

SIR: The enemy have embarked on board their vessels on the Patuxent, and will, as I presume, in execution of their desolating system, proceed immediately to some other of our principal towns. Richmond is known to be one on which they have fixed their attention; Norfolk and Baltimore are others. Against which they will move, in the first instance, will probably not be known, until they land their men in a marked direction towards it.

Be on your guard, prepared at every point, and in all circumstances, to repel the invaders.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

State of Virginia, Richmond.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Sept. 6, 1814.

SIR: I am sorry to inform you that the enemy's squadron has passed our battery, at the White House, on the Potomac river. It was impossible to collect such a number of heavy pieces, in the present state of affairs here, as to prevent it.

The fleet which had descended the Patuxent, with the troops on board, lately employed against this city, and a reinforcement since received, which had paused at the mouth of that river, on account, as was supposed, of the detention of this squadron, descended the bay yesterday, either for the Potomac or some other object lower down the bay. As it doubtless will immediately know that the squadron has passed our battery, it may proceed to such other object; which must be, I presume, if it has one in the bay, either Norfolk or Richmond.

I hasten to give you this intelligence, that you may be prepared to meet the enemy, should they present themselves at either place.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

His Ex'cy the GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA.

No. 4.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Sept. 10, 1814.

SIR: The enemy has passed down the bay, out of sight, below Annapolis. It may be presumed that they will attack either Richmond or Norfolk.

The force collected near Richmond is, I trust, fully adequate to its defence.

Norfolk, General Porter writes me, is not so well prepared. Cannot some additional force be thrown in to its aid? I fear the reinforcement from North Carolina will not arrive there in time.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant

JAMES MONROE.

His Ex'cy the GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Oct. 6, 1814.

SIR: For the expenditure attending the militia who have been called into the service of the United States by this Department, or the commander of the military district No. 5, the United States are regularly chargeable.

For any advances made by the State of Virginia, for the support of such troops, reimbursement is of course due.

No call of the militia, except in the modes above stated, is obligatory on the United States. In the case under consideration, it is true, that the call made by the Executive of the State was notified to this Government, with a request that the militia might be taken into the service of the United States. This, however, does not remove the objection to the right in a State, at its discretion, to subject the United States to such expenses.

The President is aware that the predatory incursions of the enemy, and the menace of a more serious attack on the principal cities along our seaboard, made an extra call of militia, in certain cases, necessary. Whether the troops which were called into service by the Executive of Virginia, for the defence of Richmond, are more than were necessary for the purpose, is a question which could not be immediately decided: it will be attended to as soon as circumstances will admit. In making the decision, regard must be had to just principles, taking into view similar claims of other States.

For the present, I am authorized to state that one hundred thousand dollars will be advanced to the Executive, on account of money paid by it in support of the troops in the service of the United States, in the first instance, and the balance on account of the other claims alluded to, which are hereafter to be adjusted.

On the proposition to take the militia now assembled for the defence of Richmond into the service of the United States, I have to state that it will be acceded to as to four thousand of these troops, provided the Executive of the State should be of opinion that they may be, in the present less menacing posture of the enemy, spared from their present service, to be employed between this and Baltimore, in lieu of a like number lately called from the State for that purpose.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

Hon. CHARLES EVERETT.

CLAIM FOR PRIZE MONEY.

[Communicated to the Senate, December 28, 1815.]

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20, 1815.

SIR: In support of the petition presented to the honorable the Senate of the United States, and referred to their honorable Naval Committee, praying remuneration to those interested, for the captures made by the late United States brig Argus, under the command of my late brother William H. Allen. I have the honor to present, herewith, a letter from Benjamin Homans, Esq., of the Navy Department, to me, with a chart of the track of the Argus, and a list of the vessels she captured, &c., and the documents that were found on board those vessels.

The chart shows the course of the Argus from L'Orient, up the western coast of Ireland, into the river Shannon, and thence round into St. George's Channel, where she was captured. The red letters on the list of vessels indicate the time and place of their capture on the chart.

It appears, upon examination, that no invoices were found on board the captured vessels; those appertaining to the vessels bound coastwise were probably sent overland by mail; but I am unable to account for the absence of the others; the bills of lading that were signed were probably likewise sent by mail; and the bills of lading and custom-house documents herewith, are the only or chief means by which an estimate of the value of the cargoes can be formed. Lieutenant Watson, of the Argus, on his return from England to this country, delivered at the Navy Department a report respecting the value, &c., of these vessels and their cargoes, which he estimated at about three millions of dollars, as will be seen by referring to the letter from Mr. Homans. I cannot find this report, and Lieutenant Watson is absent from this country. His means of ascertaining their value from the officers of the captured vessels, and while in England, were much greater than the papers presented herewith alone afford; but, unwilling to overrate the amount, and in order to make adequate allowance for such an error, should there be any in this report, I have thought best to state the sum in the petition at five hundred thousand dollars less than is expressed in his report.

I made application at the Navy Department for the log-book of the Argus, which, perhaps, contains some information of importance on the subject, but it has not yet been found; as soon as it is discovered, I shall beg leave to add the evidence it may afford to that presented now.

Some of the vessels taken were very valuable, and among them were those from the West Indies. The cargo of the Bedford alone (with Irish linen, &c., from Dublin for London) would have brought in this country nearly one million of dollars.

I have not been able to ascertain of what kind or quality were the goods chiefly composing the cargo of the brigantine Ann; but they were most probably linen manufactures, and, if fine, were very valuable. I have written to ascertain their character from Dennison, the Purser of the Argus, who is at Baltimore. The schooner Matilda and ship Betsey were the vessels recaptured by the enemy.

The schooner Salamanca, captured on the passage from this country to France, was an armed Government vessel, as her papers show; and the principle upon which awards have already been made for the destruction of the national vessels of the enemy, applies fully to her. And what prevents the application of the same principle where the commerce of the enemy has been destroyed? As having reduced the actual power of the enemy, the capture of a few of their national vessels cannot be considered of much importance, their whole number being so great, and the means of replacing those that were lost so extensive, it can only be justly prized as having lessened the naval reputation of the enemy while it increased our own, and raised the glory of the nation. Aside from this last consideration, the demolition of the enemy's instruments of annoyance gives claim to no greater reward than the destruction of the means by which those instruments are obtained. A nation cannot long support a war, from which the means are taken that enabled her to operate against an enemy; but leave her the means, and she will always be armed, being at all times able to replace her losses. To attack the commerce of the enemy was, therefore, the best mode of wounding her, and upon that conviction were the orders to my brother predicated; in which the honorable Secretary of the Navy observes, "in no way can the enemy be made to feel our hostility so effectually, as by annoying and destroying his commerce, fisheries, and coasting trade; this would carry the war home to their direct feelings and interests, and would produce an astonishing sensation." And the sequel demonstrated that hostility in that form was far more dreadful and destructive to her interests than any other which it could assume.

In another view, the claim of the subject to consideration is at least as strong. A law of the United States gives to captors the moiety of their captures; and I believe the position is correct, that the property in them vests the moment they are captured. But the power to convert such property before condemnation is not possessed either by the United States or the captors; and the United States have no greater authority to dispose of it, either before or after condemnation, than is enjoyed by the captors. My late brother was, therefore, compelled by his orders to destroy what actually belonged in part to himself and his crew; and the Executive authority having exercised the power of directing the disposal of those captures in a way that deprived the captors of their property in them, they have, it is humbly conceived, a just claim upon the United States for indemnity. There is something accruing, under existing laws, for the guns and men captured, but the amount is very small.

The continued loss of sleep, together with the excessive fatigue consequent upon such a rapid succession of captures, and the extreme watchfulness necessary in so exposed a situation, disabled the Argus from making so great a resistance to her more powerful enemy as she might otherwise have done. And although victory hung no laurels over the tombs of those who fell, nor on the brows of the survivors, their misfortune has not sullied the fame of our arms, nor diminished their title to the remembrance of their country.

With the strongest conviction of the justice and liberal sentiments of the honorable gentlemen of the Senate, to whose consideration this subject has been referred, I shall look with confident hope to a favorable result.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient humble servant,

THOMAS J. ALLEN,
Attorney and agent.

The Hon. CHARLES TAIT,
Chairman Com. on Naval Affairs.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 13, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to the Naval Committee of the Senate, in compliance with your request of the 8th instant, the several papers herewith, marked A and B. The papers marked A contain a list of all the merchant vessels captured by the public armed ships of the United States during the late war, and subsequently destroyed at sea in obedience to the orders of this Department to that effect.

The papers marked B contain the orders, and extracts from such parts of orders, to the commanders of the ships and vessels of war under which the vessels captured were destroyed at sea.

Those captured vessels which were sent to the United States, and arrived safely, are not included, nor those which were manned for the United States, or friendly ports in Europe, and afterwards recaptured, with a number of others which were liberated as cartels; the list being exclusively confined to the captured vessels destroyed, as far as the journals and reports have been made to this Department by the several commanding officers.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, June 5, 1813.

SIR: When the honorable Mr. Crawford, Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States to France, is ready for departure, you will receive him and his suite on board, and proceed, with the first favorable opportunity, to sea, directing your course, without deviating for any other object, to the first port in France. In all probability you will find Brest or L'Orient the easiest of access; but should you have an opportunity of landing the Minister, on any part of the coast of France, you may thereby avoid much risk in attempting to enter a port before which you may find a hostile squadron. But in whatever way you may effect the first object of your destination, you will then proceed upon a cruise against the commerce and light cruisers of the enemy, which you will capture and destroy in all cases; unless their value and qualities shall render it morally certain that they may reach a safe and not distant port. Indeed, in the present state of the enemy's force, there are very few cases that would justify the manning of a prize; because, the chances of reaching a safe port are infinitely against the attempt, and the weakening the crew of the Argus might expose you to an unequal contest with the enemy.

It is exceedingly desirable that the enemy should be made to feel the effects of our hostility, and of his barbarous system of warfare; and in no way can we so effectually accomplish that object, as by annoying and destroying his commerce, fisheries, and coasting trade. The latter is of the utmost importance, and is much more exposed to the attack of such a vessel as the Argus, than is generally understood. This would carry the war home directly to their feelings and interests, and produce an astonishing sensation.

For this purpose, the cruising ground from the entrance of the British channel to Cape Clear, down the coast of Ireland, across to, and along the northeast coast of England, would employ a month or six weeks to great advantage. The coasting fleets on this track are immensely valuable; and you would also be in the way of their West India homeward fleet, and of those to and from Spain, Portugal and the Mediterranean. When you are prepared to leave this ground, you may pass round the northwest of Ireland, towards Fair Island passage, in the track of the Archangel fleets, returning home in August and September.

When it shall be absolutely necessary to return home, you will pursue such route as may best promote the objects of your cruise, and endeavor to make some Eastern port; perhaps Portsmouth may be as easy of access, and as convenient, in other respects, as any other.

On your arrival in France you will, with the aid of Mr. Crawford, be better able to form an opinion of the expediency of attempting to send prizes into France, or of touching there to replenish your stores in order to protract your cruise.

Your own disposition, and the amiable character of the Minister, insure to him the kindest attention on your part; and I am persuaded that you will derive the most ample gratification from such an intercourse. Your talents and honorable services are deeply impressed upon this Department, and will not cease to excite its attention.

Wishing you a prosperous and honorable cruise. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. JONES.

Lieutenant WM. H. ALLEN,
Commanding U. S. brig Argus.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Captain Charles Stewart, commanding the United States' frigate Constitution, dated September 19, 1813.

The commerce of the enemy is the most vulnerable point we can attack, and its destruction the main object; and to this end all your efforts should be directed. Therefore, unless your prizes shall be very valuable, and near a friendly port, it will be imprudent, and worse than useless, to attempt to send them in; the chances of recapture are excessively great; the crew, and the safety of the ship under your command, would be diminished and endangered, as well as your own fame, and the national honor, by hazarding a battle after the reduction of your officers and crew by manning prizes. In every point of view, then, it will be proper to destroy what you capture; except valuable and compact articles, that may be transhipped.

This system gives to one ship the force of many; and, by granting to prisoners a cartel, as sufficient numbers accumulate, our account on that head will be increased to our credit, and not only facilitate the exchange, but insure better treatment to our unfortunate countrymen who are, or may be, captured by the enemy.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Master Commandant George Parker, commanding the United States' brig Siren, dated December 8, 1813.

Your own observation must have proved to you how precarious and uncertain is the prospect of getting prizes into a friendly port; and that the manning of a few prizes will soon terminate your cruise, and diminish your force so as to jeopardise the safety of the Siren, and your own reputation, by a chance conflict with an enemy, nominally your equal, but fully manned. With every patriotic officer private motives will yield to considerations of public good; and as the great object and end of our public force is to harass and distress the enemy, and as the most effectual annoyance is the destruction of his trade and commerce, it ought to be the ruling principle of action with every commander.

A single cruiser, if ever so successful, can man but a few prizes, and every prize is a serious diminution of her force; but a single cruiser, destroying every captured vessel, has the capacity of continuing, in full vigor, her destructive power so long as her provisions and stores can be replenished, either from friendly ports or from the vessels captured.

Thus has a single cruiser, upon the destructive plan, the power, perhaps, of twenty, acting upon pecuniary views alone; and thus may the employment of our small force, in some degree, compensate for the great inequality compared with that of the enemy. Considered even in a pecuniary point of view, the chances of the safe arrival of the prize are so few, and of recapture by the enemy, so many, that motives of interest alone are sufficient; but when we consider that it is, in all probability, consigning the prize crew to a loathsome prison, in the hands of a perfidious and cruel enemy, every just motive will combine to urge the destruction, rather than the manning, of every prize.

The American people and Government have given abundant proof that they are deficient neither in gratitude nor generosity. I, therefore, strenuously urge and order the destruction of every captured vessel and cargo, unless so near to a friendly port as to leave little doubt of safe arrival, or that the merchandise shall be so valuable and compact as to admit of transshipment, without injury to the vessel under your command, or to the public service.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Master Commandant John Orde Creighton, having under his command the United States' brigs Rattlesnake and Enterprise, Lieutenant Commandant James Kershaw, dated December 22, 1813.

The great object, however, is the destruction of the commerce of the enemy, and bringing into port the prisoners, in order to exchange against our unfortunate countrymen who may fall into his hands. You will, therefore, man no prize, unless the value, place of capture, and other favorable circumstances, shall render her safe arrival morally certain. As the ransoming of British vessels is prohibited by a statute, and the ransom bonds declared void, you will not agree to the ransoming of any prize. The enemy has also, in violation of his own agreement, and of good faith, refused to recognise cartels granted at sea; you will, therefore, grant no cartel, nor liberate any prisoners, unless under circumstances of extreme and unavoidable necessity.

Be assured, sir, that the confidence of our country cannot be enhanced by any new achievements of our gallant Navy; it is now entire, and the services of an officer will now be estimated by the extent of the injury he may inflict upon the vital interest of the enemy in the destruction of his commerce.

[Instructions, the same as the preceding to Captain Creighton, were given, January 6, 1814, to Master Commandant Joseph Bainbridge, commanding the United States' sloop of war Frolic.]

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Master Commandant Lewis Warrington, commanding the United States' sloop-of-war Peacock, dated

FEBRUARY 26, 1814.

You will therefore, sir, unless in some extraordinary cases that shall clearly warrant an exception, destroy all you capture; and by thus retaining your crew, and continuing your cruise, your services may be enhanced tenfold. The service you may render your country will be estimated by the extent of the injury you may inflict upon its implacable enemy; and this will be best accomplished in the annoyance and destruction of its commerce, from which no other object should be suffered to divert your attention for a moment. With this view, as well as from the rational and obvious policy opposed to this practice, I have it in command from the President, strictly to prohibit the giving or accepting, directly or indirectly, a challenge to combat ship to ship.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Master Commandant Johnson Blakely, commanding the United States' sloop-of-war Wasp, dated

If the qualities of the Wasp are such as I feel confident they will prove to be, you cannot fail to make a brilliant and productive cruise. Your own sound judgment and observation will sufficiently demonstrate to you, how extremely precarious and injurious is the attempt to send in a prize, unless taken very near a friendly port, and under the most favorable circumstances. A failure of success places our unfortunate seamen in the hands of the enemy, diminishes your means of achieving honor to yourself and glory to your country, curtails your cruise, and subjects you to the unequal attack of a foe, nominally your equal, but fully manned. Hence, it is evident, that policy, interest, and duty, combine to dictate the destruction of all captures, with the above exceptions. It is a great object with the enemy to capture and detain in prison, our seamen; and this can only be counteracted by capturing and bringing into port an equal number; this is an object of great national importance; the releasing at sea on parole, though practised by all civilized nations, is utterly disregarded by our enemy.

[Instructions relative to the disposition of captures, the same as the preceding, were given, March 16, 1814, to Master Commandant Charles D. Ridgely, commanding the United States' sloop of war Erie.]

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Captain Charles Stewart, commanding the United States' frigate Constitution, dated

NOVEMBER 29, 1814.

Having, on former occasions, urged the superior policy and advantage of destroying the captures you may make, in preference to the hazardous attempt to send them in, unless in the vicinity of a friendly port, and in the case of very valuable and fleet sailing prizes, I need not now dwell upon that subject.

Daily experience, and the grievous complaints of the merchants of Great Britain, sufficiently attest the efficacy of the system. Should you touch at any friendly port for succors, you will observe the strictest economy, and put to sea again with the least possible delay. The general instructions you have from time to time, received from this Department, and your own experience, will supersede the necessity of further details, and, in the event of any casualty, or occurrence, which, in your judgment, may render a deviation from these instructions indispensable to the public interest, you will act accordingly, still adhering, as near as may be, to their general spirit and intention.

[Instructions, similar to the preceding, were given, 30th November, 1814, to Captain Charles Morris, commanding the United States' frigate Congress.]

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Captain David Porter, commanding a squadron of small vessels at New York, dated

NOVEMBER 30, 1814.

Having already given to you the necessary instructions for procuring, arming, equipping, and manning, the five vessels destined for your command, you will, as soon as the squadron shall be ready for sea, proceed upon a cruise in the West Indies, where you will employ your force, either collectively or separately, in annoying and destroying the commerce of the enemy, which the nature of your force, seconded by your judgment and enterprise, will, I trust, enable you to execute, as well in his harbors as at sea, and upon a scale so extensive as to make him participate deeply in the evils which he has inflicted upon our prosperity.

[Instructions similar to the preceding to Captain Porter, were given the same day, November 30, 1814, to Captain Oliver H. Perry, commanding another squadron of small vessels.]

CAPTURE OF THE PENGUIN.

[Communicated to the House, December 21, 1815.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 21, 1815.

SIR: In compliance with your request, in behalf of the honorable Committee upon Naval Affairs, I have the honor to transmit to you, herewith, copies of letters from Captain James Biddle, of the United States ship Hornet, dated March 25th, and April 8th, 1815, addressed to Commodore Stephen Decatur, as commander of the squadron destined to cruise in the Indian seas; which contain all the information in the possession of this Department relative to the capture of the British sloop of war Penguin.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your most obedient servant,

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

Hon. JAMES PLEASANTS, JUN.,
Chairman Naval Committee.

UNITED STATES' SLOOP HORNET, Off Tristan D'Acunha, March 25, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, on the morning of the 23d instant, at half past ten, when about to anchor off the north end of the island of Tristan d'Acunha, a sail was seen to the southward and eastward, steering to the westward, the wind fresh from S. S. W. In a few minutes, she passed on to the westward, so that we could not see her for the land. I immediately made sail to the eastward, and shortly after, getting sight again, perceived her to be up before the wind; I hove to for her to come down to us. When she had approached near, I filled the main-top-sail, and continued to yaw the ship, while she continued to come down, veering, occasionally, to prevent her passing under our stern. At forty minutes past one, P. M., being nearly within musket shot distance, she hauled her wind on the starboard tack, hoisted English colors, and fired a gun. We immediately luffed to, hoisted our ensign, and gave the enemy a broadside. The action being thus commenced, a quick and well directed fire was kept up from this ship, the enemy gradually drifting nearer to us, when, at fifty-nine minutes past one, he bore up, apparently to run us on board. As soon as I perceived he would certainly fall on board, I called the boarders, so as to be ready to repel any attempt to board us. At the instant, every officer and man repaired to the quarter deck, where the two vessels were coming in contact, and eagerly pressed me to permit them to board the enemy; but this I would not permit, as it was evident, from the commencement of the action, that our fire was greatly superior both in quickness and in effect. The enemy's bowsprit came in between our main and mizzen rigging, on our starboard side, affording him an opportunity to board us, if such was his design; but no attempt was made. There was a considerable swell on, and as the sea lifted us ahead, the enemy's bowsprit carried away our mizzen shrouds, stern davits, and spanker boom, and he hung upon our larboard quarter. At this moment, an officer, who was afterwards recognised to be Mr. McDonald, the first lieutenant, and the then commanding officer, called out that they had surrendered. I directed the marines and musketry men to cease firing, and, while on the taffrail, asking if they had surrendered, I received a wound in the neck. The enemy just then got clear of us, and his foremast and bowsprit being both gone, and perceiving us veering to give him a fresh broadside, he again called out that he had surrendered. It was with difficulty I could restrain my crew from firing into him again, as he had certainly fired into us after he had surrendered. From the firing of the first gun to the last time the enemy cried out he had surrendered, was exactly twenty-two minutes by the watch. She proved to be His Britannic Majesty's brig Penguin, mounting sixteen thirty-two pound carronades, two long twelves, a twelve pound carronade on the topgallant forecastle, with swivels on the capstern, and in the tops. She had a spare port forward, so as to fight both her long guns of a side. She sailed from England in September last. She was shorter upon deck than this ship by two feet, but she had a greater length of keel, greater breadth of beam, thicker sides, and higher bulwarks, than this ship, and was, in all respects, a remarkably fine vessel of her class. The enemy acknowledge a complement of one hundred and thirty-two, twelve of them supernumerary marines from the Medway seventy-four, received on board in consequence of their being ordered to cruise for the American privateer Young Wasp. They acknowledge, also, a loss of fourteen killed, and twenty-eight wounded; but Mr. Mayo, who was in charge of the prize, assures me that the number of killed was certainly greater. Among the killed are Captain Dickinson, who fell at the close of the action, and the boatswain; among the wounded are the second lieutenant, purser, and two midshipmen. Each of the midshipmen lost a leg. We received on board, in all, one hundred and eighteen prisoners, four of whom have since died of their wounds. Having removed the prisoners, and taken on board such provisions and stores as would be useful to us, I scuttled the Penguin this morning before daylight, and she went down. As she was completely riddled by our shot, her foremast and bowsprit both gone, and her mainmast so crippled as to be incapable of being secured, it seemed inadvisable, at this distance from home, to attempt sending her to the United States.

This ship did not receive a single round shot in her hull, nor any material wound in her spars; the rigging and sails were very much cut; but, having bent a new suit of sails, and knotted and secured our rigging, we are now completely ready, in all respects, for any service. We were eight men short of complement, and had nine upon the sick list the morning of the action.

Enclosed is a list of killed and wounded. I lament to state that Lieutenant Conner is wounded dangerously; I feel great solicitude on his account, as he is an officer of much promise, and his loss would be a serious loss to the service.

14th CON. 1st SESS.—56

It is a most pleasing part of my duty to acquaint you that the conduct of Lieutenants Conner and Newton, Mr. Mayo, acting lieutenant, Lieutenant Brownlow, of the marines, Sailing-master Romney, and the other officers, seamen, and marines, I have the honor to command, was, in the highest degree, creditable to them, and calls for my warmest recommendation. I cannot, indeed, do justice to their merits. The satisfaction which was diffused throughout the ship, when it was ascertained that the stranger was an enemy's sloop-of-war, and the alacrity with which every one repaired to quarters, fully assured me that their conduct in action would be marked with coolness and intrepidity.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
J. BIDDLE.

Commodore DECATUR.

NAVAL OPERATIONS AGAINST THE BARBARY POWERS IN 1815.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 11, 1816.]

Mr. TARR, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, communicated the following documents, relative to the operation of the squadron under the command of Commodore Decatur against the Barbary Powers:

U. S. SHIP GUERRIERE,
Off Carthage, June 19, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that on the 17th instant, off Cape de Gat, the squadron fell in with and captured an Algerine frigate of forty-six guns, and between four and five hundred men, commanded by Rais Hammida, who bore the title of Admiral. She struck her flag after a running fight of twenty-five minutes. The Admiral was killed at the commencement of the action. After the Guerriere (who from her favorable position was enabled to bring the enemy to close action) had fired two broadsides, they, with the exception of a few musketeers, ran below. The Guerriere had four men wounded by musket shot, which is the only injury done by the enemy in this affair. It is with pain I have to communicate to you that one of our main deck guns burst in the first discharge, by which accident five men were killed and thirty badly wounded and burnt. This gun was only doubly shot; and permit me to state, that, unless some more effectual mode is adopted in proving our guns, I fear the frequency of such accidents will be injurious to the service, beyond the loss of men occasioned thereby. The steadiness of our men adjoining the bursting gun was worthy of admiration. Although many of them were much burnt and wounded, it did not occasion a pause in their fire. We have four hundred and six prisoners, including the wounded. The prisoners state about thirty were killed and thrown overboard.

Their squadron is said to be cruising in our vicinity; five days ago they were off this place. Unless I obtain some further intelligence of them by to-morrow, I shall proceed to the port of Algiers in the hope of intercepting their return. For the present I have determined to send the prize into Carthagea.

The enclosed is a return of the wounded by the enemy, as also those who were killed and wounded by the bursting of the gun.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

STEPHEN DECATUR.

Hon. B. W. CROWNINSHIELD,
Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. SHIP GUERRIERE,
Off Cape Palos, June 20, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, on the 19th instant, off Cape Palos, the squadron under my command captured an Algerine brig of twenty-two guns and one hundred and eighty men. After a chase of three hours, she run into shoal water, where I did not think it advisable to follow with our large ships, but despatched the Epervier, Spark, Torch, and Spitfire, to whom she surrendered after a short resistance. Twenty-three men were found dead on board. We received from her eighty prisoners, the residue of her crew having left her in boats; many of them must have been killed by the fire of our vessels, and one of the boats was sunk. None of our vessels sustained any damage, nor was there a man killed or wounded. This brig is larger than the Epervier, was built in Algiers five years ago by a Spanish constructor, the same who built the frigate captured on the 17th instant, and is perfectly sound.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

STEPHEN DECATUR.

Hon. B. W. CROWNINSHIELD,
Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. SHIP GUERRIERE,
Bay of Algiers, July 5, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you of the proceedings of this squadron subsequent to the date of my letter of the 20th ultimo. Having put the greater part of our prisoners on board the captured brig, I sent her into Carthagea, and made sail for Algiers, where we arrived on the 28th. Finding the Algerine squadron to be still out, and knowing that they had been at sea a longer period than usual, and that a despatch boat had been sent to Algiers to inform them of our arrival in the Mediterranean, I thought it probable that they would seek shelter in some neutral port. It seemed, therefore, a favorable moment to deliver a letter from the President to the Dey, pursuant to instructions from the Department of State, which would afford them an opportunity to open a negotiation, if they thought fit. A negotiation was accordingly opened, and a Treaty of Peace was dictated by us, and finally concluded in twenty-four hours, in the manner related in the despatch of Mr. Shaler and myself to the Secretary of State.

This treaty, possessing all the favorable features of those which have been concluded with the most favored nations, and other advantages conceded to us only, I flatter myself will be considered honorable to the United States, particularly when we compare the small force employed on this occasion with the formidable expeditions which have often, and without success, been sent against Algiers. It has been dictated at the mouth of the cannon, has been conceded to the losses which Algiers has sustained, and to the dread of still greater evils apprehended; and I beg leave to express to you my opinion, that the presence of a respectable naval force in this sea will be the only certain guarantee for its observance.

Having concluded the treaty, I have, in conformity with your instructions to dispose of such vessels we might capture as would be unsafe to send home in such manner as would seem to me most expedient, restored them, in their present state, to the Dey of Algiers. This was earnestly requested by the Dey, as it would satisfy his people with the conditions of the peace; and it was determined by Mr. Shaler and myself, that, considering the state of those vessels, the great expense which would be incurred by fitting them for a voyage to the United States, and the little probability of selling them in that part of the world, it would be expedient to grant the request.

I have appointed Captain Downes, of the Epervier, to the Guerriere, and Lieutenant Shubrick, first of the Guerriere, to the Epervier, which brig I have determined to send home with the despatches. These arrangements, I trust, will meet the approbation of the Government. The ten American prisoners who were confined in Algiers have been delivered up, and I have given them a passage in the despatch vessel.

I shall now proceed with the squadron to Tunis, and thence to Tripoli. At the latter place, I understand, there exists some difficulty between our Consul and the Regency; of what nature I am not particularly informed.

I have charged Captain Lewis with the delivery of the despatches to the Government, and the flags taken from the Algerine Admiral and brig. He is an officer of great merit, and whom I beg leave strongly to recommend to the notice of Government.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

STEPHEN DECATUR.

Hon. B. W. CROWNINSHIELD,
Secretary of the Navy.

UNITED STATES' SHIP GUERRIERE,
Bay of Tunis, July 31, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, upon my arrival at this anchorage, I was made acquainted with the following transactions, which had taken place here during our late war with Great Britain: Two prizes, which had been taken by the Abellino privateer, and sent into this port, were taken possession of by a British vessel of war while lying within the protection of the Bey of Tunis.

The Consul having communicated to me the information of this violation of our Treaty with Tunis, I demanded satisfaction from the Bey. After some hesitation, and proposing a delay of payment for one year, my demand was acceded to, and the money, amounting to forty-six thousand dollars, was paid into the hands of the consul, Mr. Noah, agent for the privateer.

Of the papers I have the honor to transmit herewith, No. 1 is a copy of the Consul's letter to me, No. 2 is a copy of my letter to the Prime Minister of the Bey, and No. 3 is a copy of the Consul's acknowledgment of the receipt of the money.

I shall proceed immediately for Tripoli, and will give you early information of the further proceedings of this squadron. The Bey of Tunis has now lying in this harbor, nearly ready for sea, three frigates and several smaller vessels of war.

I have the honor be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

STEPHEN DECATUR.

Hon. B. W. CROWNFIELD,
Secretary of the Navy.

No. 1.

U. S. CONSULATE, TUNIS,
July 25, 1815.

SIR: On or about the 21st of February, two American prizes, while at anchor, and within the immediate protection of His Excellency the Bey of Tunis, were forcibly seized and taken possession of by the boats of His Britannic Majesty's brig Lyra, Dowell O'Reily, Esq., commander, and sent to Malta. In order to afford the just and necessary protection to American property, to cause our rights and the existing Treaty to be respected, I have deemed it my duty to claim of the Bey of Tunis the value of said prizes.

His Excellency, though sensible of the violation of the neutrality of his port, and the loss sustained in the illegal capture of the American property when within his waters, still waives the settlement of this claim, and is desirous to procrastinate the arrangement to a length of time which will deprive the owners of the benefit of their labor and danger. Under these circumstances, I do myself the honor to solicit from you such co-operation, in enforcing the respect due to our rights and treaties, as you may deem proper to afford. With great respect, &c.,

M. M. NOAH.

Com. S. DECATUR, Commander, &c.

P. S. In the disposal of the cargo of one of the English prizes, an intrigue was set on foot and prosecuted by a company of merchants, under the sanction and protection of the Prince Sidi Mustapha, by which the owners have been defrauded of a considerable sum of money. For the satisfactory adjustment of this claim, some interference appears equally necessary.

U. S. SHIP GUERRIERE,
Bay of Tunis, July 26, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose to your Excellency a despatch from the Department of State of the United States, by which you will perceive the friendly disposition of my Government towards the Bey and Regency of Tunis. When that despatch was written, it was believed that an equally friendly disposition existed on the part of Tunis. With surprise I understood, on my arrival in the Mediterranean, that the treaty existing between the two countries had been violated on the part of Tunis; first, by permitting two vessels, which had been captured by an American vessel, to be taken out of the port of Tunis by a British cruiser; and secondly, by sanctioning a company of Jew merchants, subjects of Tunis, in taking the property of an American citizen at their own price, and much below its real value.

In consequence of this information, as soon as we had obtained justice from Algiers for their aggressions, I hastened to this port, with the power and disposition to exact from this Regency an observance of our treaty. I now require immediate restitution of the property or of its value. Your Excellency will perceive the necessity of the earliest attention to this communication, and of making known to me the decision of His Excellency the Bey with the least possible delay.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

STEPHEN DECATUR,
Commander, &c.

To the PRIME MINISTER of His Excellency the Bey of Tunis.

No. 3.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, AT TUNIS.

To all whom it may concern:

Whereas, on the 17th and 21st days of February, 1815, the English schooner Dunster Castle, and the English brig Charlotte, the former laden with oil and fish, the latter with currants and fustic, were sent into the harbor of Tunis, having been captured by the American private armed brig Abellino, William F. Wyer, commander; the said prizes, when within the waters and under the immediate protection of His Excellency the Bey of Tunis, were taken possession of and sent to Malta, by His Britannic Majesty's brig Lyra, Dowell O'Reily, Esq., commander, then at anchor in the said harbor of Tunis. That application was made to His Excellency the Bey of Tunis for payment for said vessels, amounting to forty-six thousand Spanish dollars, according to their just and regular valuation. His Excellency the Bey of Tunis having ascertained fully and satisfactorily, that the beforementioned vessels, being American property, were within his waters illegally and forcibly carried away, and being sensible of the necessity of causing his rights to be respected, did order that payment should be made for said vessels according to their valuation.

Now, therefore, I, the undersigned, Consul of the United States of America for the city and Kingdom of Tunis, and agent for the concerned, do hereby make known and certify, that the payment of said vessels according to their valuation, say forty-six thousand Spanish dollars, has been received from His Excellency the Bey of Tunis; who, by these presents, is acquitted from all claim against him on account of said prizes.

Given under my hand and seal of office, at Tunis, this 30th day of July, 1815, and [L. s.] in the fortieth year of the American independence. M. M. NOAH.

I do hereby certify, that the sum of forty-six thousand Spanish dollars has been paid for the two prizes as above stated, to the American Consul; and that the United States has no further claim on His Excellency the Bey of Tunis for these vessels.

S. DECATUR,
Commander, &c.

U. S. SHIP GUERRIERE,
Messina, August 31, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, immediately after the date of my last communication, I proceeded to Tripoli. Upon my arrival off that place, I received from our Consul a letter, a copy of which (No. 1,) is herewith transmitted. In consequence of the information contained in this letter, I deemed it necessary to demand justice from the Bashaw. The enclosure (No. 2) is a copy of my note to the Prime Minister of Tripoli. On the next day the Governor of the city of Tripoli came on board the Guerriere to treat in behalf of the Bashaw. He objected to the amount claimed by us, but finally agreed to our demands. The money, amounting to the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, has been paid into the hands of the Consul, who is agent for the privateer. The Bashaw also delivered up to me ten captives, two of them Danes, and the others Neapolitans.

I have the honor to enclose the letter of the Consul, informing me of the conclusion of this affair. During the progress of our negotiations with the States of Barbary, now brought to a conclusion, there has appeared a disposition, on the part of each of them, to grant as far we were disposed to demand. Any attempt to conciliate them, except through the influence of their fears, I should expect to be vain. It is only by the display of naval power that their depredations can be restrained. I trust the successful result of our small expedition, so honorable to our country, will induce other nations to follow the example; in which case, the Barbary States will be compelled to abandon their piratical system. I shall now proceed with the squadron to Carthage, at which place I hope to find the relief squadron from America.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, yours, &c., STEPHEN DECATUR.

Hon. B. W. CROWNINSHIELD,
Secretary of the Navy.

No. 1.

U. S. CONSULATE AT TRIPOLI,
August 6, 1815.

SIR: I have the pleasure of now laying before you all the documents relative to the unlawfully seizing, in the port of Tripoli, and under the guns of the forts, two American prizes, captured by the Abellino, and taken out by the English brig Paulina. I have fully addressed the United States' Government on this affair, and hope you have come fully prepared to demand and obtain ample satisfaction.

It is a case attended with such a flagrant violation of the United States' Treaty with this Regency, and our neutral rights, that it calls for the most prompt and energetic conduct on the part of the United States, which will not only convince this Power, but all others, that our rights and privileges cannot be invaded with impunity. If, however, the Bashaw, contrary to my opinion, should refuse us that satisfaction we are justly entitled to, it is my determination to leave the Regency by this occasion.

I shall have the pleasure of seeing you, and will detail more fully the events as they have taken place. In the interim, I have the honor, &c.,

RICHARD B. JONES.

Com. STEPHEN DECATUR,
On board the U. S. frigate Guerriere.

No. 2.

U. S. SHIP GUERRIERE,
Off Tripoli, August 6, 1815.

SIR: I have been officially informed that the Bashaw of Tripoli has permitted a British sloop-of-war, pending hostilities between that nation and the United States, to take from out of his harbor, and from under the guns of his castle, two American prizes, and refused protection to an American cruiser lying within his waters, in direct violation of the treaty which existed between our two nations. As soon as I had settled with Algiers for her aggressions, and with Tunis for a similar outrage to the one now complained of, I hastened to this place with a part of the squadron under my command.

With ample power to take satisfaction for the violation of our treaty above stated, I only follow the invariable rule of my Government, in first making a demand of justice. I have, therefore, to inform your Excellency that I require that immediate restitution be made of the value of the vessels taken from the harbor of Tripoli as before stated, and also compensation for the loss occasioned by the detention of the American cruiser, in violation of the treaty. Your Excellency will perceive the necessity of making known to me the determination of His Excellency the Bashaw, in relation to the above demands, with the least possible delay.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, your Excellency's most obedient servant,
STEPHEN DECATUR.

His Exc'y the PRIME MINISTER of His Exc'y the Bashaw of Tripoli.

Estimates for Building and Equipping Ships.

TRIPOLI, August 9, 1815.

SIR: Permit me to congratulate you on the honorable adjustment of all differences which have existed between the United States and this Regency. This arrangement may not only be considered as just and honorable for the United States, but also as highly advantageous to the interest of our citizens. I have no doubt this lesson will long serve to keep in the remembrance of the Bashaw the power, justice, and humanity of the United States. To your dignified, firm, and manly conduct throughout this affair, the United States are indebted for the standing we now have; and, as the representative of our country here, permit me to offer the sincere homage of respect, esteem, and regard, with which I have the honor to be, &c.

RICHARD B. JONES.

Commodore STEPHEN DECATUR,
Commander-in-Chief, &c.

UNITED STATES' SHIP GUERRIERE,
Naples Sept. 8, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to inform your Excellency that in my late negotiation with the Bashaw of Tripoli, I demanded and obtained the release of eight Neapolitan captives, subjects of His Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies. These I have landed at Messina. It affords me great pleasure to have had it in my power, by this small service, to evince to His Majesty the grateful sense entertained by my Government of the aid formerly rendered to us by His Majesty during our war with Tripoli.

With great respect and consideration, I have the honor to be, &c.

STEPHEN DECATUR.

His Ex'cy the MARQUIS CIRCELLO,
Secretary of State, &c.

NAPLES, September 12, 1815.

SIR: Having laid before the King, my master, the papers which you have directed me, dated the 8th instant, in which you were pleased to acquaint me that, in your last negotiation with the Bey of Tripoli, you had freed from the slavery of that Regency eight subjects of His Majesty, whom you had also set on shore at Messina: His Majesty has ordered me to acknowledge this peculiar favor, as the act of your generosity, which you have been pleased to call a return for the trifling assistance which the squadron of your nation formerly received from his Royal Government during the war with Tripoli.

In doing myself the pleasure of manifesting this sentiment of my King, and of assuring you, in his name, that the brave American nation will always find in His Majesty's ports the best reception, I beg you will receive the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

Secretary of State, &c.

ESTIMATES FOR BUILDING AND EQUIPPING SHIPS.

[Communicated to the Senate, Jan. 15 and 29, 1816.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Jan 13, 1816.

SIR: In compliance with the request of the honorable Committee of the Senate upon Naval Affairs, communicated by your letter of the 8th instant, I have the honor to enclose to you, herewith, the several estimates, in detail, marked A, B, and C.

By these estimates, it appears that the cost of building a seventy-four gunship would be $217,412
Equipping a seventy-four gunship would be 167,450

Building and equipping a seventy-four - $384,862

That the cost of building a forty-four would be - - - - - $153,475
Equipping a forty-four would be - - - 114,925

Building and equipping a forty-four - $268,400

That the cost of building a sloop-of-war would be - - - - - $46,293
Equipping a sloop-of-war would be - - - 35,930

Building and equipping a sloop-of-war - $82,223

It hence results that the expense which would be incurred in building and equipping one seventy-four, two forty-fours, and two sloops-of-war, would be as follows:

A seventy-four gunship - - - - - $384,862
A forty-four costs $268,400, therefore, two forty-fours would cost - - - - - 536,800
A sloop-of-war costs $82,223, therefore, two would cost - - - - - 164,446

Total cost of building and equipping one seventy-four, two forty-fours, and two sloops-of-war, would be - - - - - $1,086,108

In these estimates I have been aided by the practical knowledge and experience of the Commissioners of the Navy Board, who availed themselves of the calculations of scientific ship-builders, and the information derived from recent investigations and inquiries of the market price of the materials, and various articles of equipment.

The estimates are as correct as the fluctuating prices of labor and materials will admit, and sufficiently so to found the data upon for the amount of the contemplated annual increase of the Navy; but, so far as the calculations are conjectural, it is presumed that they may exceed the actual expenditure from five to ten per cent.

All which is respectfully submitted.

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

HON. CHARLES TAIT,
Chairman Naval Committee.

CAPTORS OF THE BRITISH SHIP-OF-WAR
LEVANT REWARDED.

[Communicated to the House, February 5, 1816.]

Mr. PLEASANTS made the following report: The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Captain Charles Stewart, late commander of the frigate Constitution, praying to be paid the value of the Levant, a British ship-of-war captured by the Constitution in her late cruise, and taken by force out of the harbor of Port Praya, a neutral port, by a squadron of British ships, have had the said petition under consideration, and make the following report: The petitioner states that, on the 20th of February 1815, with the frigate Constitution under his command, whilst cruising in the neighborhood of the island of Madeira, he fell in with two British ships of war, the Cyane mounting thirty-four guns, and the Levant mounting twenty-one; that the Constitution brought the two ships to action, and captured both after a conflict of forty minutes; that having taken possession of her prizes the Constitution proceeded on her cruise, and on the 10th of March anchored with her prizes in Port Praya in St. Jago, one of the Cape de Verd islands belonging to Portugal; that, on the next day, March the 11th, whilst lying in the said port, they discovered a squadron of ships, which ultimately proved to be British, consisting of three sail, two of sixty-eight and one of fifty guns, commanded by Sir George Collier; that the Constitution with her prizes immediately got under way, and with much difficulty escaped the enemy, who had approached very near, under cover of a thick fog, before they were discovered; that the Constitution and Cyane got off without being brought to action by so superior a force, and the Levant, which had moved in a direction to divide the attention of the enemy, being pursued, was enabled to get back into Port Praya, and anchored close under the batteries, thinking the enemy would respect the neutrality of the port; that in that situation she was attacked and taken possession of by the enemy, without any attempt on the part of the Portuguese to prevent the outrage.

The petitioner asks of Congress to pay to the officers and crew of the Constitution the value of the Levant, she having been captured by them on the high seas, and forcibly taken from a neutral port by the enemy.

The committee are of opinion that the petitioners have not a right to demand of the United States the value of the said prize. Though the Government have a right to demand of the Portuguese Government compensation for the outrage committed in one of their ports, and if compensation is made, the amount ought to be paid to the captors, yet, in the many and great losses sustained by our citizens during the late war in Europe by the violation of their neutral rights, it has not been the practice of the Government to make compensation for such losses. Were it to be done in this case, the captors would be placed in a more eligible situation than if the outrage had not been committed; in that case they would have had to encounter the ordinary dangers of the sea in bringing their prize into port; and also the hazard of recapture by the enemy. But proceeding on the principle acted on by Congress in other cases which occurred during the late war, of making some compensation for the gallantry and good conduct of the officers and men, where they did not succeed in getting their prizes into port, and such gallantry and good conduct having been signally displayed in this action, the proper tribunals having determined that the force of the enemy was superior, the committee taking the case of the Frolic captured by the Wasp, and recaptured by the enemy, as a proper criterion, the force of the Levant being about equal to that of the Frolic, and the compensation made being twenty-five thousand dollars, recommend the passage of an act authorizing the payment of that sum to the officers and crew of the Constitution, to be deducted from the value of the Levant, provided the Government succeed in obtaining such value from the Portuguese Government. For this purpose they herewith report a bill.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled. The petition of the subscriber respectfully sheweth:

PHILADELPHIA, December 22, 1815.

That, on the 20th day of February, 1815, the United States frigate Constitution, then under his command, did, in pursuance of the orders of the late honorable Secretary of the Navy, William Jones, overtake on the high seas, about sixty leagues from the island of Madeira, His Britannic Majesty's ships of war the Cyane, of thirty-four guns, commanded by Captain Gordon Falcon, and the Levant, of twenty-one guns, commanded by Captain the honorable George Douglas, both post captains in the navy of Great Britain, and did there bring to action, engage with, and capture the said two ships of war, the Cyane and Levant, after a sharp conflict of forty minutes; and that your petitioner did take possession of the two prizes aforesaid, and proceed in the frigate Constitution with them to the island of St. Jago, one of the Cape de Verds, in the possession of the troops and subjects of the Prince Regent of Portugal, with whom we were at peace, and from whom there had issued a declaration of neutrality when the war between the United States and Great Britain was made known to him; that your petitioner, having come to anchor with the Constitution, and the above named prizes, in Port Praya, in the aforesaid island of St. Jago, on the 10th day of March, 1815, discovered, on the following day, (while preparations were making by your petitioner to divest himself of his prisoners, by sending them on parole to Barbadoes agreeable to his instructions,) off the port, a squadron of three ships of war, belonging to the King of Great Britain, commanded by his officers generally, and under the command of the honorable Sir George Collier particularly, consisting of the Leander of sixty-eight guns, Newcastle of sixty-eight guns, and Acasta of fifty guns; that the said squadron by means of, and covered by, a thick fog, approached the ship Constitution and her two prizes within three miles before they were discovered, which near approach left no time for your petitioner to hesitate or deliberate on the situation of your good ship the Constitution and her two prizes, but obliged him, for the security of that valuable vessel intrusted to his care, to get under weigh and rescue her from the probable grasp of the enemy, which your petitioner did, taking with him the two prize ships aforesaid, that they might be used according to circumstances, and for the purpose of saving the Constitution: all of which was done according to the best skill and judgment of your petitioner; and your precious ship the Constitution returned in safety to the port of Boston.

And your petitioner begs leave to state, to your honorable body, that while they were in the act of getting under weigh in the harbor of Port Praya, the flag of the Prince Regent of Portugal was hoisted on two several forts, and a fire opened from their batteries upon the Constitution and her two prizes; several shot from them passing both over and striking near the bends of the Constitution; that after your petitioner had derived all the advantages he could from his prizes aforesaid, the Levant returned into the harbor of Port Praya, and came to anchor close to the batteries thereof, where she was soon after attacked by the aforesaid squadron, under the command of the aforesaid Sir George Collier, and forcibly taken possession of by them and carried from out of the harbor of Port Praya aforesaid, without the troops, garrison, or subjects of the Prince Regent of Portugal making any resistance or hindrance whatever, as they were in duty bound to do within the harbors and neutral waters of the Prince Regent of Portugal.

Your petitioner, therefore, for and in behalf of himself, the gallant officers, and crew of the frigate Constitution under his command, and in consideration of their being so unlawfully and unjustly robbed and deprived of the usual advantages that would accrue to them, for their gallantry in engaging and subduing the aforesaid two ships-of-war belonging to the King of Great Britain, humbly beg your honorable body will take this their case into consideration; and that you will be pleased to grant to them the value of the said ship Levant, of which they have been deprived as above stated; and your petitioner will ever pray, &c.

CHARLES STEWART,

Late commander of frigate Constitution.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 5, 1816.

SIR: In compliance with the instructions of the honorable Committee upon Naval Affairs, communicated by your letter of the 29th ultimo, I have the honor to enclose to you papers No. 1 to 6; which contain all the information in the possession of this Department relative to the capture of the British vessels of war Cyane and Levant, by the United States' frigate Constitution, under the command of Captain Charles Stewart, of the United States' Navy.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

Hon. JAMES PLEASANTS, Jun.

Chairman Com. on Naval Affairs.

No. 1.

U. S. FRIGATE CONSTITUTION, May, 1815.

SIR: On the 20th of February last, the island of Madaria bearing about west-southwest, distant sixty leagues, we fell in with His Britannic Majesty's two ships of war the Cyane and the Levant, and brought them to action about 6 o'clock in the evening; both of which, after a spirited engagement of forty minutes, surrendered to the ship under my command.

Considering the advantages derived by the enemy, from a divided and more active force, as also their superiority in the weight and number of their guns, I deem the speedy and decisive result of this action the strongest assurance which can be given to Government that all under my command did their duty, and gallantly supported the reputation of American seamen.

Enclosed you will receive the minutes of the action, and a list of the killed and wounded on board this ship; also, enclosed, you will receive, for your information, a statement of the actual force of the enemy, and the number of killed and wounded on board their ships as near as could be ascertained.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES STEWART.

Hon. B. W. CROWNSHIELD,

Secretary of the Navy.

No. 2.

Minutes of the chase of the United States frigate Constitution, by an English squadron of three ships, from out the harbor of Port Praya, island of St. Jago.

Commences with fresh breezes and foggy weather; at five minutes past 12, discovered a large ship through the fog, standing in for Port Praya; at eight minutes past 12, discovered two other large ships astern of her, also standing in for the port. From their general appearance, supposed them to be one of the enemy's squadrons, and, from the little respect hitherto paid by them to neutral waters, I deemed it most prudent to put to sea. The signal was made to the Cyane and Levant to get under weigh; at twelve after meridian, with our topsail set, we cut our cable and got under weigh, (when the Portuguese opened a fire on us from several of their batteries on shore;) the prize ships followed our motions, and stood out of the harbor of Port Praya close under East point, passing the enemy's squadron about gunshot to windward of them. Crossed our top-gallant yards and set foresail, mainsail, spanker, flying jib, and top-gallant sails. The enemy seeing us under weigh, tacked ship, and made all sail in chase of us. As far as we could judge of their rates from the thickness of the weather, supposed them two ships-of-the-line, and one frigate. At half past meridian, cut away the boats towing astern, first cutter and gig; at 1 P. M. found our sailing about equal with the ship on our quarter, but the frigate luffing, gaining our wake, and rather dropping astern of us; finding the Cyane dropping astern and to leeward, and the frigate gaining on her fast, I found it impossible to save her if she continued on the same course, without having the Constitution brought to action by their whole force; I made the signal at ten minutes past 1 P. M. to her to tack ship, which was complied with. This manœuvre, I conceived, would detach one of the enemy's ships in pursuit of her, while, at the same time, from her position, she would be enabled to reach the anchorage at Port Praya before the detached ships could come up with her; but, if they did not tack after her, it would afford her an opportunity to double their rear, and make her escape before the wind. They all continued in full chase of the Levant and this ship; the ship on our lee quarter firing by divisions broadsides; her shot falling short of us. At 3 P. M. by our having dropped the Levant considerably, her situation became (from the position of the enemy's frigate) similar to the Cyane, it became necessary to separate also from the Levant, or risk this ship being brought to action to cover her. I made the signal at five minutes past 3 for her to tack, which was complied with; at twelve minutes past three, the whole of the enemy's squadron tacked in pursuit of the Levant, and gave up the pursuit of this ship. This sacrifice of the Levant became necessary for the preservation of the Constitution. Sailingmaster Hixon, midshipman Varnum, one boatswain's mate, and twelve men, were absent on duty in the fifth cutter, to bring the cartel brig under our stern.

No. 3.

Minutes of the action between the United States frigate Constitution, and His Majesty's ships Cyane and Levant, on the 20th February, 1815.

Commences with light breezes from the eastward and cloudy weather; at 1, discovered a sail two points on the larboard bow; hauled up and made sail in chase; at quarter past 1, made the sail to be a ship; at three-quarters past 1, discovered another sail ahead; made them out at 2 P. M. to be both ships, standing close hauled with their starboard tacks on board. At 4 P. M. the weathermost ship made signals, and bore up for her consort, then about ten miles to leeward; we bore up after her, and set lower topmast, topgallant, and royal studding sails in chase; at half past 4, carried away our main royal mast; took in the sails and got another prepared. At 5 P. M. commenced firing on the chase, from our two larboard bow guns; our shot falling short, ceased firing; at half past 5, finding it impossible to prevent their junction, cleared ship for action, then about four miles from the two ships; at forty minutes after 5, they passed within hail of each other, and hauled by the wind on the starboard tack, hauled up their courses, and prepared to receive us; at forty-five minutes past 5, they made all sail close hauled by the wind, in hopes of getting to windward of us; at fifty-five minutes past 5, finding themselves disappointed in their object, and we were closing with them fast, they shortened sail, and formed on a line of wind about half a cable's length from each other. At 6 P. M., having them under command of our battery, hoisted our colors, which was answered by both ships hoisting English ensigns. At five minutes past 6, ranged up on the starboard side of the sternmost ship about three hundred yards distant, and commenced the action by broadsides, both ships returning our fire with great spirit for about fifteen minutes; then the fire of the enemy beginning to slacken, and the great column of smoke collected under our lee induced us to cease our fire to ascertain their positions and conditions; and in about three minutes, the smoke clearing away, we found ourselves abreast of the headmost ship, the sternmost ship luffing up for our larboard quarter; we poured a broadside into the headmost ship, and then braced aback our main and mizzen topsails, and backed astern under cover of the smoke, abreast the sternmost ship; when the action was continued with spirit and considerable effect until thirty-five minutes past 6, when the enemy's fire again slackened, and we discovered the headmost bearing up; filled our topsails, shot ahead, and gave her two stern rakes; we then discovered the sternmost ship wearing also, wore ship immediately after her, and gave her a stern rake, she luffing too on our starboard bows, and giving us her larboard broadside; we ranged up on her larboard quarter within hail, and was about to give her our starboard broadside, when she struck her colors, fired a lee gun, and yielded. At fifty minutes past 6, took possession of His Majesty's ship Cyane, Captain Gordon Falcon, mounting thirty-four guns. At 8 P. M. filled away after her consort, which was still in sight to leeward; at half past 8, found her standing towards us, with her starboard tack close hauled, with topgallant sails set, and colors flying; at fifty minutes past eight, ranged close along side to windward of her, on opposite tacks, and exchanged broadsides, wore immediately under her stern and raked her with a broadside, she then crowded all sail, and endeavored to escape by running; hauled on board our tacks, set spanker and flying jib in chase; at half past 9, commenced firing on her from our starboard bow chaser, gave her several shot, which cut her spars and rigging considerably; at 10 P. M., finding they could not escape, fired a gun, struck her colors, and yielded. We immediately took possession of His Majesty's ship Levant, Hon. Captain George Douglas, mounting twenty-one guns. At 1 A. M. the damages of our rigging were repaired, sails shifted, and the ship in fighting condition.

Captors of the British Ship of War Levant.

No. 4.—General Orders.

U. S. FRIGATE CONSTITUTION,
February 23, 1815.

Captain Stewart takes the first opportunity of returning his thanks to the officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, and marines of this ship, for their gallantry, order, and discipline, displayed by all under his command on the night of the 20th instant, while engaged with His Majesty's late ships Cyane and Levant, and congratulates them on the glorious result of their exertions; a result which could not have been produced against so superior a force, commanded by distinguished officers, without the energy and order so conspicuously exhibited by all on that occasion. We were not only outnumbered in guns and weight of metal by the enemy, but had also to contend with a more active class of vessels, and a divided force, which gave to them every advantage. Be assured that the laurels you have acquired for yourselves will never fade, and that the share of glory you have given to your country will be hailed by your fellow-citizens with the greatest satisfaction, and posterity, in beholding the trophies gained by your gallant predecessors in victory, shall view with grateful sensations the two which you have added to their number.

You will accept his thanks for the promptness with which you repaired the damages and secured the three ships, and he assures you that it will not be least among your merits, when it is known, that in one hour after a contest so severe, your own ship was ready to fight another action, and your prizes enabled to make sail.

The excellent example hitherto shown by our naval victors in their respect towards the persons and property of a subdued enemy, he trusts, will not be deviated from by any under his command; surely, there can be none among you who can be desirous of tarnishing so much of your well-earned glory, as to hesitate between the choice of being scornfully pointed at as a plunderer, or to perceive the finger of satisfaction selecting you as a hero. If, therefore, any of you have unwarily possessed yourselves improperly of either public or private property, he commands you to give it immediately to the commanding officer. You surely cannot wish to bring disgrace on your commander or your officers, whom you have so gallantly supported.

It is much to be regretted, that on occasions like the present, the commander is not permitted to see with his own eyes the distinguished merits of each officer, that he might thank them individually for their exertions, but as all must have done their duty well to produce such decisive effect, he begs they will receive his thanks collectively. He tenders to the officers commanding the gundeck, forecastle, and quarter-deck divisions, his thanks for the steady and incessant fire kept up by their batteries, the vivacity of which nothing could surpass. To Captain Henderson and Lieutenant Freeman, commanding the marines, he owes his grateful thanks for the lively and well-directed fire kept up by the detachment under their command. He thanks Mr. Hixon, and the officers stationed on the forecastle and tops, for their steady attention to orders, and the promptness with which they replaced everything important that was shot away. To Mr. Pottinger, and the officers superintending the magazines and passages, he gives his thanks for the facility with which every essential was furnished the batteries from their departments. To Doctor Kearney, and his assistants in the cockpit, he feels great obligations for their humanity and skill in relieving and assisting the wounded. Captain Stewart begs Lieutenant Ballard to accept his thanks for the prompt assistance he gave him in all the operations and manœuvres of the ship, for the alacrity with which every order was attended to, and the promptness with which they were executed, and he assures him that the gallantry and good conduct displayed by him on that occasion will make a lasting impression on his gratitude. To Mr. Humphreys, commanding the flag-guard, and the officers attached to him as aids, he gives his thanks, and assures them that he is highly satisfied with their gallantry and support.

U. S. FRIGATE CONSTITUTION,
Off New York, May 18, 1815.

SIR: Agreeably to an act of Congress, I have the pleasure to transmit to you the flags of His Captors of the British Ship of War Levant.

Britannic Majesty's late ships Cyane and Levant, by Captain Henderson, commanding the detachment of marines on board the Constitution, whom I beg leave to recommend to your notice.

Captain Henderson is also the bearer of one of the Constitution's muskets, which I request your permission to deposite in the Navy Department, as an evidence of the veracity of the late enemy.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

CHARLES STEWART.

Secretary of the Navy.

BALTIMORE, May 2, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to make known to you my arrival at this place with a part of the officers and crew of the United States frigate Constitution, captured in a prize, the Levant, in the harbor of Port Praya, in the island of St. Jago, by a squadron of His Britannic Majesty's ships, consisting of the Leander, Sir George Collier, the Newcastle, Lord George Stewart, and the Acasta, Captain Kerr. For the particulars of my recapture, I beg leave to refer you to the enclosed extract from the log-book of the Levant.

Having caused the destruction of my own papers, as well as those of the officers with me, I can only say to you, relative to the Constitution, that, after leaving the port of Boston, she severally cruised off the islands of Bermuda and Madeira, in the Bay of Biscay, and for some time in sight of the Rock of Lisbon, without having met with but two of the enemy's vessels, one of which was destroyed, the other ordered in; and that, on the evening of the 20th of February, the island of Maderia bearing west-southwest distant seventy leagues, fell in with, engaged, and, after a close action of forty minutes, captured His Britannic Majesty's ships Cyane, Captain Gordon Falcon, and Levant, Hon. Captain Douglas. It would, sir, be deemed presumption in me to attempt to give you particular details respecting the nature of this action; I shall, therefore, only remark, generally, that every officer, seaman, and marine on board did their duty. I cannot, however, deny myself the pleasure that this opportunity affords me of noticing the brilliant management of Captain Charles Stewart, through whose unerring judgment every attempt of an ingenious enemy to gain a raking position was frustrated. I have the honor to be, &c.

HENRY E. BALLARD.

The Cyane mounted on her main deck twenty-two 32lb. carronades; on her upper deck ten 18lb. carronades, two long 9's, and one 12lb. carronade, on a travelling carriage, with a complement of 175 men.

The Levant mounted eighteen 32lb. carronades, two long 9's, and one 12lb. carronade, with 138 men on board.

The Constitution had four killed and nine wounded; the Cyane, seven killed and seventeen wounded; the Levant, nine killed and seventeen wounded.

Hon. B. W. CROWNINSHIELD,
Secretary of the Navy.

And in case the aggregate amount of the said subscriptions shall exceed twenty-eight millions of dollars, the said last mentioned commissioners, after having apportioned the same as aforesaid, shall cause lists of the said apportioned subscriptions to be made out, including in each list the apportioned subscription for the place where the original subscription was made, one of which lists they shall transmit to the commissioners or one of them, under whose superintendence such subscriptions were originally made, that the subscribers may thereby ascertain the number of shares to them respectively apportioned as aforesaid. And in case the aggregate amount of the said subscriptions made during the period aforesaid, at all the places aforesaid, shall not amount to twenty-eight millions of dollars, the subscriptions to complete the said sum shall be and remain open at Philadelphia aforesaid, under the superintendence of the commissioners appointed for that place; and the subscriptions may be then made by any individual, company, or corporation, for any number of shares, not exceeding, in the whole, the amount required to complete the said sum of twenty-eight millions of dollars.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any individual, company, corporation, or State, when the subscriptions shall be opened as hereinbefore directed, to subscribe for any number of shares of the capital of the said bank, not exceeding three thousand shares, and the sums so subscribed shall be payable, and paid, in the manner following: that is to say, seven millions of dollars thereof in gold or silver coin of the United States, or in gold coin of Spain, or the dominions of Spain, at the rate of one hundred cents for every twenty-eight grains and sixty hundredths of a grain of the actual weight thereof, or in other foreign gold or silver coin at the several rates prescribed by the first section of an act regulating the currency of foreign coins in the United States, passed tenth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and six, and twenty-one millions of dollars thereof in like gold or silver coin, or in the funded debt of the United States contracted at the time of the subscriptions respectively. And the payments made in the funded debt of the United States, shall be paid and received at the following rates: that is to say, the funded debt bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, at the nominal or par value thereof; the funded debt bearing an interest of three per centum per annum, at the rate of sixty-five dollars for every sum of one hundred dollars of the nominal amount thereof; and the funded debt

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, at the time of subscribing to the capital of the said bank as aforesaid, each and every subscriber shall deliver to the commissioners, at the place of subscribing, as well the amount of their subscriptions respectively in coin as aforesaid, as the certificates of funded debt, for the funded debt proportions of their respective subscriptions, together with a power of attorney, authorizing the said commissioners, or a majority of them, to transfer the said stock, in due form of law to "the president, directors, and company, of the Bank of the United States," as soon as the said bank shall be organized. Provided always, That if, in consequence of the apportionment of the shares in the capital of the said bank among the subscribers, in the case, and in the manner, hereinbefore provided, any subscriber shall have delivered to the commissioners, at the time of subscribing, a greater amount of gold or silver coin and funded debt than shall be necessary to complete the payments for the share or shares to such subscribers, apportioned as aforesaid, the commissioners shall only retain so much of the said gold or silver coin, and funded debt, as shall be necessary to complete such payments, and shall, forthwith, return the surplus thereof, on application for the same to the subscribers lawfully entitled thereto. And the commissioners, respectively, shall deposite the gold and silver coin, and certificates of public debt by them respectively received as aforesaid from the subscribers to the capital of the said bank, in some place of secure and safe keeping, so that the same may and shall be specially delivered and transferred, as the same were by them respectively received, to the president, directors, and company, of the Bank of the United States, or to their order, as soon as shall be required after the organization of the said bank. And the said commissioners appointed to superintend the subscriptions to the capital of the said bank as aforesaid, shall receive a reasonable compensation for their services respectively, and shall be allowed all reasonable charges and expenses incurred in the execution of their trust, to be paid by the president, directors, and company, of the bank, out of the funds thereof.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the United States to pay and redeem the funded debt subscribed to the capital of the said bank, at the rates aforesaid, in such sums, and at such times, as shall be deemed expedient, anything in any act or acts of Congress to the contrary thereof notwithstanding. And it shall also be lawful for the president, directors, and company, of the said bank, to sell and transfer for gold and silver coin, or bullion, the funded debt subscribed to the capital of the said bank as aforesaid: Provided always, That they shall not sell more thereof than the sum of two millions of dollars in any one year; nor sell any part thereof at any time within the United States, without previously giving notice of their intention to the Secretary of the Treasury, and offering the same to the United States for the period of fifteen days, at least, at the current price, not exceeding the rates aforesaid.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, at the opening of subscription to the capital stock of the said bank, the Secretary of the Treasury shall subscribe, or cause to be subscribed, on behalf of the United States, the said number of seventy thousand shares, amounting to seven millions of dollars as aforesaid, to be paid in gold or silver coin, or in stock of the United States, bearing interest at the rate of five per centum per annum; and if payment thereof or of any part thereof, be made in public stock, bearing interest as aforesaid, the said interest shall be payable quarterly, to commence from the time of making such payment on account of the said subscription, and the principal of the said stock shall be redeemable in any sums, and at any periods, which the Government shall deem fit. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the certificates of such public stock to be prepared, and made in the usual form, and shall pay and deliver the same to the president, directors, and company, of the said bank on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, which said stock it shall be lawful for the said president, directors, and company, to sell and transfer for gold and silver coin or bullion at their discretion: Provided, They shall not sell more than two millions of dollars thereof in any one year.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the subscribers to the said Bank of the United States of America, their successors and assigns, shall be, and are hereby, created a corporation and body politic, by the name and style of "The president, directors, and company, of the Bank of the United States," and shall so continue until the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and by that name shall be, and are hereby, made able and capable, in law, to have, purchase, receive, possess, enjoy, and retain, to them and their successors, lands, rents, tenements, hereditaments, goods, chattels, and effects, of whatsoever kind, nature, and quality, to an amount not exceeding, in the whole, fifty-five millions of dollars, including the amount of the capital stock aforesaid; and the same to sell, grant, demise, alien or dispose of; to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in all State courts having competent jurisdiction, and in any circuit court of the United States: and also to make, have, and use, a common seal, and the same to break, alter, and renew, at their pleasure: and also to ordain, establish, and put in execution, such by-laws, and ordinances, and regulations, as they shall deem necessary and convenient for the government of the said corporation, not being contrary to the constitution thereof, or to the laws of the United States; and generally to do and execute all and singular the acts, matters, and things, which to them it shall or may appertain to do; subject, nevertheless, to the rules, regulations, restrictions, limitations, and provisions, hereinafter prescribed and declared.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, for the management of the affairs of the said corporation, there shall be twenty-five directors, five of whom, being stockholders, shall be annually appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, not more than three of whom shall be residents of any one State; and twenty of whom shall be annually elected at the banking-house in the city of Philadelphia, on the first Monday of January, in each year, by the qualified stockholders of the capital of the said bank other than the United States, and by a plurality of votes then and there actually given, according to the scale of voting hereinafter prescribed: Provided always, That no person, being a director in the Bank of the United States, or any of its branches, shall be a director of any other bank; and should any such director act as a director in any other bank, it shall forthwith vacate his appointment in the direction of the Bank of the United States. And the directors, so duly appointed and elected, shall be capable of serving, by virtue of such appointment and choice, from the first Monday in the month of January of each year, until the end and expiration of the first Monday in the month of January of the year next ensuing the time of each annual election to be held by the stockholders as aforesaid. And the board of directors, annually, at the first meeting after their election in each and every year, shall proceed to elect one of the directors to be president of the corporation, who shall hold the said office during the same period for which the directors are appointed and elected as aforesaid: Provided also, That the first appointment and election of the directors and president of the said bank shall be at the time and for the period hereinafter declared: And provided also, That in case it should at any time happen that an appointment or election of directors, or an election of the president of the said bank, should not be so made as to take effect on any day when, in pursuance of this act, they ought to take effect, the said corporation shall not, for that cause, be deemed to be dissolved; but it shall be lawful at any other time to make such appointments, and to hold such elections, (as the case may be,) and the manner of holding the elections shall be regulated by the by-laws and ordinances of the said corporation: and until such appointments or elections be made, the directors and president of the said bank, for the time being, shall continue in office: And provided also, That in case of the death, resignation, or removal, of the president of the said corporation, the directors shall proceed to elect another president from the directors as aforesaid: and in case of the death, resignation, or absence from the United States, or removal of a director from office, the vacancy shall be supplied by the President of the United States, or by the stockholders, as the case may be. But the President of the United States alone shall have power to remove any of the directors appointed by him as aforesaid.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the sum of eight millions four hundred thousand dollars in gold and silver coin, and in the public debt, shall have been actually received on account of the subscriptions to the capital of the said bank (exclusively of the subscription aforesaid, on the part of the United States) notice thereof shall be given by the persons under whose superintendence the subscriptions shall have been made at the city of Philadelphia, in at least two newspapers printed in each of the places (if so many be printed in such places respectively) where subscriptions shall have been made, and the said persons shall, at the same time, and in like manner, notify a time and place within the said city of Philadelphia, at the distance of at least thirty days from the time of such notification, for proceeding to the election of twenty directors as aforesaid, and it shall be lawful for such election to be then and there made. And the President of the United States is hereby authorized, during the present session of Congress, to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint, five directors of the said bank, though not stockholders, anything in the provisions of this act to the contrary notwithstanding; and the persons who shall be elected and appointed as aforesaid, shall be the first directors of the said bank, and shall proceed to elect one of the directors to be president of the said bank; and the directors and president of the said bank, so appointed and elected as aforesaid, shall be capable of serving in their respective office, by virtue thereof, until the end and expiration of the first Monday of the month of January next ensuing the said appointments and elections, and they shall then and thenceforth commence, and continue the operations of the said bank, at the city of Philadelphia.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the directors, for the time being, shall have power to appoint such officers, clerks, and servants, under them, as shall be necessary for executing the business of the said corporation, and to allow them such compensation for their services, respectively, as shall be reasonable; and shall be capable of exercising such other powers and authorities for the well governing and ordering of the officers of the said corporation as shall be prescribed, fixed, and determined, by the laws, regulations, and ordinances, of the same.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the following rules, restrictions, limitations, and provisions, shall form and be fundamental articles of the constitution of the said corporation, to wit:

1. The number of votes to which the stockholders shall be entitled, in voting for directors, shall be according to the number of shares he, she, or they, respectively, shall hold, in the proportions following, that is to say, for one share and not more than two shares, one vote; for every two shares above two, and not exceeding ten, one vote; for every four shares above ten, and not exceeding thirty, one vote; for every six shares above thirty, and not exceeding sixty, one vote; for every eight shares above sixty, and not exceeding one hundred, one vote; and for every ten shares above one hundred, one vote; but no person, copartnership, or body politic, shall be entitled to a greater number than thirty votes; and after the first election, no share or shares shall confer a right of voting, which shall not have been holden three calendar months previous to the day of election. And stockholders actually resident within the United States, and none other, may vote in elections by proxy.

2. Not more than three-fourths of the directors elected by the stockholders, and not more than four-fifths of the directors appointed by the President of the United States, who shall be in office at the time of an annual election, shall be elected or appointed for the next succeeding year; and no director shall hold his office more than three years out of four in succession; but the director who shall be the president at the time of an election may always be reappointed or re-elected, as the case may be.

3. None but a stockholder, resident citizen of the United States, shall be a director; nor shall a director be entitled to any emolument; but the directors may make such compensation to the president, for his extraordinary attendance at the bank, as shall appear to them reasonable.

4. Not less than seven directors shall constitute a board for the transaction of business, of whom the president shall always be one, except in case of sickness or necessary absence; in which case his place may be supplied by any other director whom he, by writing, under his hand, shall depute for that purpose. And the director so deputed may do and transact all the necessary business, belonging to the office of the president of the said corporation, during the continuance of the sickness or necessary absence of the president.

5. A number of stockholders, not less than sixty, who, together, shall be proprietors of one thousand shares or upwards, shall have power at any time to call a general meeting of the stockholders, for purposes relative to the institution, giving at least ten weeks' notice in two public newspapers of the place where the bank is seated, and specifying in such notice the object or objects of such meeting.

6. Each cashier or treasurer, before he enters upon the duties of his office, shall be required to give bond, with two or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the directors, in a sum not less than fifty thousand dollars, with a condition for his good behaviour, and the faithful performance of his duties to the corporation.

7. The lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which it shall be lawful for the said corporation to hold, shall be only such as shall be requisite for its immediate accommodation in relation to the convenient transacting of its business, and such as shall have been bona fide mortgaged to it by way of security, or conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings, or purchased at sales, upon judgments which shall have been obtained for such debts.

8. The total amount of debts which the said corporation shall at any time owe, whether by bond, bill, note, or other contract, over and above the debt or debts due for money deposited in the bank, shall not exceed the sum of thirty-five millions of dollars, unless the contracting of any greater debt shall have been previously authorized by law of the United States. In case of excess, the directors under whose administration it shall happen, shall be liable for the same in their natural and private capacities; and an action of debt may in such case be brought against them, or any of them, their or any of their heirs, executors, or administrators, in any court of record of the United States, or either of them, by any creditor or creditors of the said corporation, and may be prosecuted to judgment and execution, any condition, covenant, or agreement to the contrary notwithstanding. But this provision shall not be construed to exempt the said corporation or the lands, tenements, goods, or chattels of the same from being also liable for, and chargeable with, the said excess. Such of the said directors, who may have been absent when the said excess was contracted or created, or who may have dissented from the resolution or act whereby the same was so contracted or created, may respectively exonerate themselves from being so liable, by forthwith giving notice of the fact, and of their absence or dissent, to the President of the United States, and to the stockholders, at a general meeting, which they shall have power to call for that purpose.

9. The said corporation shall not, directly or indirectly, deal or trade in anything except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money lent and not redeemed in due time, or goods which shall be the proceeds of its lands. It shall not be at liberty to purchase any public debt whatsoever, nor shall it take more than at the rate of six per centum per annum for or upon its loans or discounts.

10. No loan shall be made by the said corporation, for the use or on account of the Government of the United States, to an amount exceeding five hundred thousand dollars, or of any particular State, to an amount exceeding fifty thousand dollars, or of any foreign Prince or State, unless previously authorized by a law of the United States.

11. The stock of the said corporation shall be assignable and transferrable, according to such rules as shall be instituted in that behalf, by the laws and ordinances of the same.

12. The bills, obligatory and of credit, under the seal of the said corporation, which shall be made to any person or persons, shall be assignable by endorsement thereupon, under the hand or hands of such person or persons, and his, her or their executors or administrators, and his, her or their assignee or assignees, and so as absolutely to transfer and vest the property thereof in each and every assignee or assignees successively, and to enable such assignee or assignees, and his, her or their executors or administrators, to maintain an action thereupon in his, her or their own name or names: Provided, That said corporation shall not make any bill obligatory, or of credit, or other obligation under its seal for the payment of a sum less than five thousand dollars. SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of each of the principal assessors, within fifteen days from the first of June, to attend in person, or in case of his sickness, by a deputy to be appointed by him, at six several places within his district most convenient to the inhabitants, the court-houses being of the number, except where they exceed six, and then at each court-house within the district, for one full day at each place, for the purpose of receiving any in-

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That each of the said principal assessors shall, within ten days after the said fifteen days, according to the information so received, or to any other information satisfactory to him, revise the general lists for his district, and note in a supplementary form such changes as shall appear to him to have occurred; and shall, within the said term of ten days, make out a distinct statement of each change, which shall include the name of the person so liable to tax, and the valuation of the property, and shall either cause the same to be delivered to such person, or to be put in the mail, addressed to him or her, and directed to the post office nearest to his or her abode, agreeably to the best information of the said principal assessor, with a notification of the times and places of hearing any appeals that may be made, as hereinafter provided for: Provided, That no such notice need be given to persons not residing within the district.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said principal assessor to attend at the several places aforesaid within his district, within fifteen days from the expiration of the ten days aforesaid, for at least one day at each court-house, for the purpose of receiving any appeals that may be made in writing as to the changes aforesaid, which changes shall be open to the inspection of any person who may apply to inspect the same.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the changes aforesaid shall be made in the following manner, and according to the following principles, in addition to those hereinbefore stated, that is to say:

In all cases that relate to real estate, and to the transfer of slaves, other than is herein specially provided for, the rate at which the same were or would have been valued under the act aforesaid, passed the ninth of January, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, shall, as near as may be, be maintained; excepting where a partial alienation of real estate shall occur, in which case the original tax shall be apportioned among the several parts according to their existing value.

In all other cases relative to slaves, the valuation shall be made according to their existing value.

In cases in which real property shall have been once sold for taxes, and purchased on behalf of the United States, such property shall, notwithstanding, continue to be entered on the general lists, and the tax lists, in the name of the original proprietor, until the period allowed for the redemption thereof shall have expired, after which, unless redeemed, it shall be stricken therefrom; but after being so purchased it shall not, while it remains unredeemed, be again sold for any other direct tax; and, during such period, the redemption thereof shall only be effected on the payment of all the taxes, additions, and charges due thereon, the same as if it still continued the property of the original owner, and as if it had been sold for each accruing tax; and the collectors shall, on rendering the proper accounts, be credited for the amount of taxes on property thus continuing unredeemed.

Any person becoming the owner of a slave by transfer to him from a district other than that in which he resides, shall, at the time and place prescribed by the third section of this act, furnish the principal assessor with a statement, specifying the sex and age of such slave, who shall be valued according to his or her existing value; and any such person who shall neglect to furnish a statement, shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding ten dollars; one half thereof for the use of the United States, and the other half for the use of the informer. And where a transfer of a slave shall be made by a person residing within one district to a person residing in another, which shall become known to the principal assessor of the former district, he shall forthwith advise, through the mail, the principal assessor of the latter district thereof, who shall, in case the statement aforesaid shall not have been rendered as aforesaid, institute a prosecution against the person to whom the transfer has been made for the said penalty.

In all cases the individual statements of changes shall be made out in such a manner as may be directed by the principal assessor, and shall, in their form, be as similar as practicable to the lists taken at the preceding assessment.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of insuring a correct execution of the objects aforesaid, the principal assessors shall take and pursue all other lawful measures, by the examination of records, the entry on the premises, or by any other satisfactory proof, which they shall consider necessary.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, within thirty days after the expiration of the time allotted as aforesaid to the hearing of appeals, it shall be the duty of the principal assessor in each district to revise, agreeably to his decision and the information he may possess, the enumerations and valuations aforesaid, correcting the same agreeably to the changes aforesaid, and to make out a complete corrected list of all the enumerations and valuations in his district, agreeably to the form prescribed by the act aforesaid, passed the ninth of January, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, which the said principal assessor shall sign and preserve among his official papers; and

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That so much of the thirty-ninth section of the act aforesaid, passed the ninth of January, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, as respects the time within which transfers and changes of property shall be ascertained, and the making out and delivery of the lists thereof, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That in case any circumstance shall prevent a compliance, in point of time, with the foregoing provisions, the steps required shall nevertheless be taken thereafter; in which event the same notices shall be given, and the same terms of time be allotted to the performance of the several duties that would have been requisite had no such failure existed.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the duties aforesaid, required of the principal assessors, and the compensation for the performance thereof, shall be confined to those States which shall not have assumed the payment of the direct tax laid in any year, or, having assumed, shall not have duly paid the same.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That in default of the performance of the duties enjoined by this act on any principal assessor, he shall forfeit and pay, for the use of the United States, a sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, to be sued for and recovered in the name of the United States in any court having competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That all letters to and from the principal assessors, relative to their official duties, shall be transmitted free of postage. And any principal assessor who shall put his frank on any other letter, shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten dollars, the whole of which shall be for the use of the person who shall give information thereof.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the compensations heretofore allowed to the principal assessors, they shall respectively receive, for every year in which a direct tax shall be laid, a salary of two hundred dollars, and three dollars for every hundred taxable persons contained in the tax lists delivered to the collectors, together with an allowance for their necessary and reasonable charges for books and stationery used in the execution of their duties, which said duties shall be considered as embracing the correction of errors, as authorized by law. And the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to augment, in cases where he shall deem it necessary, the foregoing compensations: Provided, That there shall not be allowed to any one principal assessor, in any such year, more than two hundred dollars, in addition to his fixed compensation: And provided, That the whole extra amount thus allowed shall not exceed in such year ten thousand dollars. And for the purpose of carrying this act into effect; there is hereby appropriated, in each year in which a direct tax shall be laid, a sum of one hundred thousand dollars, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That any other existing appropriation for the said purposes be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the time now fixed by law for the commencement of the collection of the direct tax, it shall be in each district immediately subsequent to the day on which the tax lists shall be delivered to the collector thereof.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which a tax shall be charged for slaves, the real estate of the person charged therewith may be sold therefor, in the same manner as for a tax due thereon; but no slaves sold for taxes shall be purchased on behalf of the United States.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to assign to the commissioner of the revenue the duty of superintending the assessor's valuations and assessments, under the laws imposing a direct tax, as well as the collection of the tax, subject to his directions and control, according to the powers vested in him by law.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the foregoing provisions shall apply to any direct tax imposed or to be imposed upon the District of Columbia, and shall be and remain in force, anything in any former act or acts to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 19. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That the equalization and apportionment of the direct tax made in the year eighteen hundred and fifteen by the board of principal assessors for the State of Delaware, in virtue of the before recited act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for the assessing and collecting the same," shall not be in force or have any effect as it relates to that State's quota of the direct tax imposed by the act of Congress, passed the fifth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, or that shall be imposed by any subsequent act of Congress; and it shall be the duty of the said board of principal assessors again to convene in general meeting on the first Monday in June next, at Dover, in the said State, and then and there diligently and carefully reconsider and re-examine the several lists of valuation for the direct tax for the said State, for the year one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and they shall have power to revise, alter, readjust, and equalize the several lists of valuation aforesaid for the counties of the said State respectively, by adding thereto or deducting therefrom such a rate per centum, as shall render the valuation of the said counties relatively equal according to

Be it enacted, &c., That a drawback of six cents for every gallon of spirits, not below first proof, distilled within the United States, or the Territories thereof, shall be allowed on all such spirits as shall be exported to any foreign port or place, other than the dominions of any foreign State immediately adjoining to the United States, adding to the allowance upon every gallon of such spirits so distilled from molasses, four cents; which allowances shall be made without deduction: Provided, That the quantity so exported shall amount to one hundred and fifty gallons at the least, to entitle an exporter thereof to drawback, and that no drawback shall be allowed whenever any of the said spirits shall be exported otherwise than in vessels not less than thirty tons burden.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in order to entitle the exporter or exporters to the benefit of drawback allowed by this act on such spirits so distilled, the vessels or casks containing the same shall be branded or otherwise marked, in durable characters, with progressive numbers, with the name of the owner, the quantity thereof, to be ascertained by actual gauging, and the proof thereof. And the exporter of such spirits shall, moreover, previous to putting or lading the same on board of any ship or vessel for exportation, give six hours' notice at least to the collector of the customs for the district from which the same are about to be exported of his or her intention to export the same; and shall make entry in writing of the particulars thereof, and of the casks or vessels containing the same, and of their respective marks, numbers, and contents, and of the place or places where deposited, and of the port or place to which, and ship or vessel in which they or either of them shall be so intended to be exported; and the form of the said entry shall be as follows: Entry of domestic spirits, intended to be exported by [here insert the name or names,] on board of the [insert the denomination and name of the vessel,] whereof [insert the name of the master] is master, for [insert the port or place to which destined,] for the benefit of drawback.

Marks.	Numbers.	Casks and contents.	Gauge.

And the said collector shall, in writing, direct the surveyor or other inspecting officer to inspect, or cause to be inspected, the spirits so notified for exportation; and if they shall be found to correspond fully with the notice concerning the same, and shall be so certified by the said surveyor, or other inspecting officer, the said collector, together with the naval officer, if any there be, shall grant a permit for lading the same, on board of the ship or vessel named in such notice and entry as aforesaid; which lading shall be performed under the superintendence of the officer by whom the same shall have been so inspected; and the said exporter or exporters shall likewise make oath that the said spirits, so notified for exportation, and laden on board such ship or vessel, previous to the clearance thereof, or within twenty days after such clearance, are truly intended to be exported to the place whereof notice shall have been given, and are not intended to be reloaded within the United States or the Territories thereof.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted. That, for all distilled spirits which shall be exported to any foreign port or place, and which shall be entitled to the benefit of drawback, in virtue of this act, the exporter or exporters shall be entitled to receive from the collector of the customs for such district a debenture or debentures, assignable by delivery and endorsement, for the amount of the drawback to which such spirits are entitled, which shall be received in payment of direct taxes and internal duties in the collection district in which the same shall be granted: Provided, always, That the collector aforesaid may refuse to grant such debenture or debentures, in case it shall appear to him that any error has arisen, or any fraud has been committed; and in case of such refusal, if the debenture or debentures claimed shall exceed one hundred dollars, it shall be the duty of the said collector to represent the case to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who shall determine whether such debenture or debentures shall be granted or not. And provided further, That in no case of an exportation of spirits entitled to drawback, in virtue of this act, shall a debenture or debentures issue, unless the exporter or exporters shall, before the clearance of the ship or vessel in which the spirits were laden for exportation, or within twenty days after such clearance, make oath or affirmation that the said spirits notified for exportation as aforesaid, and laden on board such ship or vessel, are truly intended to be exported to the place whereof notice shall have been given, and are not intended to be reloaded within the United States; and shall moreover give bond, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the collector, in a sum equal to double the amount of the sum for which such exporter may be entitled to claim a debenture, conditioned that the said spirits, or any part thereof, shall not be reloaded in any port or place within the limits of the United States, and that the exporter or exporters shall produce, within the time limited, the proof and certificates required, of the said spirits having been delivered without the limits aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said bond shall be drawn, as near as may be, in the same form, and may be discharged in the same manner, as are, or may be prescribed by law in relation to cases where drawback is allowed on the exportation of merchandise imported into the United States, and the like penalties shall be incurred, and proceedings had, whether in regard to officers of the United States or other persons, and the same fees be allowed in cases relative to drawback on domestic distilled spirits, as in cases relative to drawback on foreign spirits; and the form of the said bond, and of the other documents, oaths, and affirmations, not herein inserted, shall be prescribed by the Treasury Department.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the duty at present authorized to be drawn back on sugar refined within the United States, and exported therefrom, there may hereafter be drawn back on such refined sugar, when made out of sugar imported into the United States, the further sum of four cents per pound without deduction, which shall be allowed under the same provisions with the duty now permitted to be drawn back; and furthermore, on the express condition that the person exporting the same shall swear, or affirm that the same, according to his belief, was made out of sugar imported from a foreign port or place; which oath or affirmation, in case the collector of the customs shall not be satisfied therewith, shall be supported by the certificate of a reputable refiner of sugar to the same effect, and that the drawback on refined sugar heretofore imported, be allowed, subject to the regulations applicable to the drawback of duties on other imported articles.
